POWERS OF THE WORLD MOVE TO END WAR

French Cabinet Takes Initiative, Urging President Fallieres to Take Steps Toward Peace Between Italy and the Turks
Berlin Sentiment Also Favors a Quick Termination of Hostilities, Big Financial Interests Being Behind the Movement

PARIS, Sept. 30.—Intervention of the Powers in the Balkan situation is believed in diplomatic circles here to be most likely.

The French cabinet late today called upon President Fallieres and requested him to have France inaugurate a movement looking to the quick cessation of hostilities.

Berlin dispatches say that there is a growing impression in government circles here that the war between Italy and Turkey will be brief. The large financial interests behind the movement to have France inaugurate a movement looking to the quick cessation of hostilities.

The report late today, however, that the British has thrown its arms into the war, puts an even more serious complexion on the situation and caused more apprehension than does the primary cause of the war, as it involves, through the British, the possibility of a general European war.

It is said here that England and Germany are ready to back France in this step. Several French cabinet have telegraphed Italy offering their services for prompt entry.

This report followed the action of the Turkish government, which today addressed appeal to the powers to prevent the war.

In the appeal Turkey expressed regret that Italy's action in declaring war was not only a violation of the rights of the Powers to assist in containing Italy of the continuing hostilities of Turkey and to prevent the shedding of blood and grief to thousands of families.

The government has asked the United States to take charge of the interests of Ottoman subjects in Italy.

The German ambassador in Turkey, von Marlow, has notified the Powers today that Germany had assumed protection of Italian subjects and interests in Turkey. The Italians in Turkey number 50,000.

The war office announced measures to make the rule of martial law more severe because of the public excitement. Public meetings and alarmist publications are prohibited, and any movement calculated to excite public order will be immediately suppressed by force of arms. Sufficient troops have been stationed in convenient places to meet emergencies.

Italy Explains Reasons.
A dispatch from Berlin says that Italy today gave a detailed note to the Powers explaining her reasons for the action against Turkey, expressing the hope that the steps taken will be confined to the occupation of Tripoli, that hostilities will be of short duration and that negotiations to fix the status of Tripoli will be begun soon.

Italy, it is stated, will endeavor to limit the hostilities. The note closes with the assurance that the steps taken are in the interests of humanity and civilization, and that no effort will be spared to protect the subjects of other nations in Tripoli.

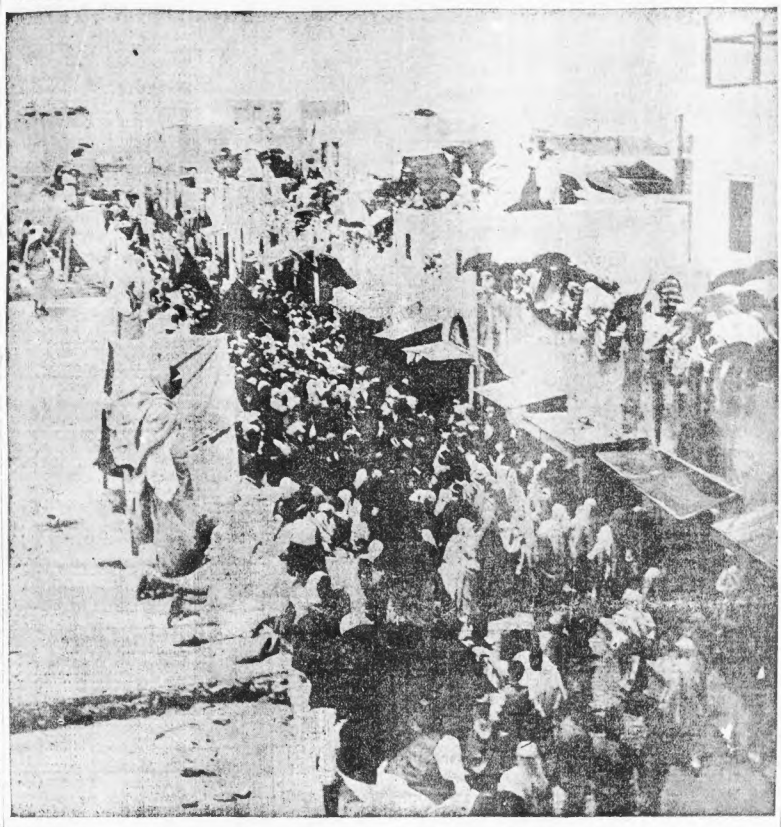

Believe War Will Be Short.
In diplomatic circles there seems to be an impression that the war will be short. Word comes from various European banking centers that within a few days peace will be at sight.

This depends, of course, on whether Turkey will submit to Italy's invasion of Tripoli without making serious objection. It is generally believed that it will take a few days more to get anything like an estimate of the probable extent of the conflict that has begun.

This photograph shows the principal business street of Tripoli during the celebration of the Mohammedan festival of the Ramadan. A number of Turkish soldiers may be seen in the foreground.

NORTH END SWEEP BY MARTIAL SPIRIT

Two Big Parades, Led by Bands, Cheered by Thousands Along Crowded Streets.

Italian hosts in abate with excitement. The whole population of the North end was out last night. It filled the cafes and overpowered the streets.

The new recruits will, nevertheless, stand in the doorway of their shops and shout at the Italians in the crowds in the streets.

The Italian bands lined up their uniforms and playing national airs marched up and down the streets of the quarter. The population fell in behind them. Turkish flags appeared, red and white, and many were furnished by volunteers and laid down parades crossed and returned upon one another's routes.

The bands and the parades were cheered by those on the sidewalks and by the women and children from the windows. When the Italian flag appeared in the procession, men unweaved and shouted themselves hoarse.

"Down With the Turks."
The American colors were displayed as much as freely as the Italian and "Down with the Turks" was painted upon a hastily constructed transparency.

Made and shouting and singing, made the crowd roared until a late hour and every little while some youth, who declared his intention of returning to fight the enemy, was seen.

Duke of the Abruzzi Directs Fleet in Sharp Engagement With Enemy; Turks Carry War Into Greece and Crete's Plan Uprising for Independence Army Ready for Immediate Occupation of Tripoli

Special Cable to the Sunday American
TRIPOLI, Sept. 30.—The Italian squadron began a bombardment of the forts here in an effort to dislodge the Turks at 10 o'clock today.

The occupation of Tripoli up to that time consisted merely of the seizure of the customs house, which was effected 24 hours ago.

The fire from the battleships is being directed solely at the forts. The section of the city in which the consulates are situated is being spared.

The forts, which are old and scantily armed, are responding as best they can.

CONSTANTINOPLE, Sept. 30.—Mahmoud Sherif Pasha, the Turkish minister of war, tonight wired instructions to the Turkish commander in Tripoli to arouse the religious fanaticism of the Arabs for the purpose of provoking a holy war.

This plea to passion has never been known to fail. These actions, coming close upon the announcement that Turkey would not fight, shows that the quick action of Italy in the past twenty-four hours has turned Turkey from the supreme spectator to the bitter aggressor.

LONDON, Sept. 30.—Europe seems with a wonder today to be the first that a war that may be regarded as its terrible results has begun, and that it may spread like a conflagration in a day rather than it comes in an end. The war of Italy today bombarded Tripoli, on the southern shore of Africa and Pervia, a seacoast city of Turkey. The Italian fleet of war, by their shelling yesterday and today, guard the entire coast of Tripoli and are so situated that it will be difficult, if not impossible, for Turkey to send aid to that corner. Italy's action is regarded here as spurring the down of Turkey and as putting the Turks in a position that they are forced to fight.

War at a Glance

The Turkish commander is ordered to defend Tripoli from Italian invasion.

The bombardment of Tripoli by the Italian fleet begins.

The Italian fleet bombards the fortified port of Pervia in the Adriatic Sea, destroying the government house and sinking a Turkish torpedo boat.

The Sultan of Turkey throws his army into the sea.

The Greek army is being mobilized to repel the Turkish invasion.

The French cabinet asks President Fallieres to take the initiative in intervention.

The report of the sinking of Turkish destroyers off Pervia by the Italian warships under command of the Duke of the Abruzzi on Friday is confirmed.

The Sultan's naval forces are virtually bottled up along the Turkish coast.

Italy sends a note to the powers, explaining at length her reasons for the war. Turkey has followed with a note appealing to the powers to stop the war.

A flotilla of Italian torpedo boats has been ordered to enter the Adriatic Sea, between Italy and Turkey, to protect Italian shipping.

THOUSAND DEAD AS FLOOD WIPES OUT WHOLE TOWN

Giant Concrete Dam Bursts at Austin, Pa. Hurling Terrible Flood of Waters on Defenseless People, Blotting Out the Whole Town and Ravalling in Horror the Great Johnstown Flood

Fire Completed Destruction of Buildings Not Swept Away by Torrent, Which Plunged Farther Down Valley and Wrought Havoc in Costello—Terrible Scenes Are Described By An Eye-Witness

COSTLESPORT, Pa., Sept. 30.—Death in its most tragic form claimed, it is estimated, at least one thousand men, women and children in Austin, twelve miles from here, this afternoon, when the giant concrete dam of the Haystack Pulp and Paper Company suddenly gave way and the liberated waters, like a huge tidal wave, swept down upon the unsuspecting town and practically blotted it from the earth.

The disaster recalled with vividness the flood that tore down the Conemaugh valley more than a score of years ago and drowned nearly 2,300 of Johnstown's population.

Adding to the horror of the scene and multiplying its victims, a fire started which, in spite of the swirling waters about the foundations of the wrecked houses, burned the structures and their contents, leaving the once pretty, prosperous lumber town of 2,300, a lifeless collection of smoking charnel houses.

The first news of the bursting dam came to this place from an upstart man who escaped from the deadly waters and rode on horse back to the nearest telephone. This is the cry for help that he sent over the wires:

"FOR GOD'S SAKE, SEND HELP!"

"For God's sake try and get some help to Austin. The big dam, a mile long and 100 feet wide and fifty feet deep, burst, and hundreds of lives are lost. People are dying in the streets."

"The buildings that were not entirely swept away are burning now. We need tents, groceries and nurses and all kinds of supplies, money and everything."

"I am the first one out and had to ride on horseback to get this message to you. Send help quickly."

As others who escaped with their lives reached telephone and telegraph wires outside of the devastated town they flashed the direful news over northern Pennsylvania and southern New York, turning those sections of the country into districts of the wildest excitement.

From a score or more of towns and cities special trains, automobiles and other vehicles loaded with doctors, food and clothing, were hurried to the valley of death and suffering.

FORTY CHARRED BODIES REMOVED

Forty charred bodies of victims had been removed late to night. Men worked frantically at the ruins, disinterred, in some cases, by the cries of imprisoned victims who were momentarily in danger of being burned to death.

With the receding waters bodies are being found east as far as Costello. Many towns on the Sinnemahoning Creek below Austin are yet to add their toll to the aggregate.

A Bell telephone lineman saw the advance of "the water from the top of a pole. He tore open a long distance wire and notified Gallatin with his test instrument and then fled to the hills, barely escaping with his life.

The country around Austin is filled with wells of natural gas, and this evening the gas in the main began to burn. At 9 o'clock the flames were beyond control. The apparatus from Olean, N. Y., which arrived at Austin early in the evening, was practically useless, as all water mains in the town had been destroyed.

MANGLED VICTIMS UNDER THE WRECKAGE.

On the buildings overlooking the town of mothers to save their loved ones that place. Many whose names were almost unknown by the world happened and were pitifully slain (as) followed rain about while crying out in a hysterical agony. Many went to the bathroom of their great-hungry lodgings, home and family having been annihilated in a moment.

It may be several days before the number of dead is ascertained with any degree of accuracy. Many of the bodies of the entrapped victims were discovered yesterday of the ruins have already begun their work, and an effort is being made to identify the bodies that lie in great rows at the edge of the town.

Dispatches and telephone messages received here tonight say that the damage that destroyed Austin is now sweeping

Our Millinery Showing

Is perfect. If we were to print all the good points of this wonderful Millinery Exhibit it would take this entire sheet; therefore, we only mention a few of the very unusual offerings.

A showing of $13.50 and $15 Trimmed Dress Hats $10

Every one of them brand new, smart and up to date, not out of our workrooms as this advertisement is being written. Why we quote these values is because we know what others, and ours for style and quality far surpass any quoted at these prices near these prices.

Finest Quality Trimmed Velour Moods—laurelly trimmed with heavy de cygne drapery and handsome cockade with Parisian buckle; any color, and trimmed complete for less money than the untrimmed would cost elsewhere.

Dress and Street Hats—Made velvet hats or the felt hats, beautifully trimmed with wings, velour, feather, handsome ornaments, etc. Most of these hats are trimmed in our own workrooms and are exclusive with us.

Just 100 Beautiful Feather Turbans—Made in France to our special order. We won't quote what they should bring. We offer them for $5.98

$4 Silk Petticoats

That Were Made $2.55 With Every Intention to sell at $4.

Many women have at one time or other bought silk petticoats for less than $4.00 and were undoubtedly badly disappointed in their wearing qualities. The market is flooded with cheap petticoats that are made up specially to sell at low prices and which lose their shape and the silk, owing to their poor quality, soon fall into shreds.

These petticoats, which we sell at $2.55, are not cheap petticoats. Every woman knows that a good silk petticoat must at least cost $4.00, and these petticoats were made with every intention to be sold regularly at $4.00. This is a splendid opportunity for the woman who has always wanted a good silk petticoat but did not want to pay their full price. Made of splendid well wearing muslin and tulle with full deep flounce, according to latest fashion, under-ruffle $2.55

New Morgan Stock Saddle $7.40

Used by the U. S. Cavalry. Half cantle for these rifles, size A, B, C.

$25 Springfield Carbine $2.95

Used by the U. S. Cavalry. Half cantle for these rifles, size A, B, C.

OUR 46TH COMMERCIAL BIRTHDAY

THE HOUSES OF SHEPARD

WE ARE READY FOR THE YEAR'S MOST IMPORTANT EVENT

Those who came from all over New England last year to attend the great Boston Sale are already wondering if equal values will be given on this occasion.

Are becoming noted throughout the civilized world because of the phenomenal success of their Anniversary Sales, which are so far in advance of all other sales in Wonderful Value-Giving and amount of sales, as to cause consternation and investigation by those producing the ordinary Anniversary Sales.

YES—WE PROMISE GREATER VALUES

The new Shepard spirit had not reached all of our stores last year. This year our managerial forces are alive to the possibilities only partly guessed at before.

EAGER TO HELP US

Are also the manufacturers and importers. Now that they fully understand the magnitude of our tremendous sale, they give to the event by their co-operation, thousands of dollars, all of which goes to YOU, our readers.

OUR 46TH COMMERCIAL BIRTHDAY

EAGER HANDS AND WILLING HEARTS STAND BEHIND THE COUNTERS AS ANXIOUS AS WE ARE FOR THE SUCCESS OF THE DAY—ANXIOUS TO HAVE THEIR FRIENDS AND OURS GET SOME OF THE VALUES THEY KNOW ARE SO REMARKABLE—SO OUT OF THE COMMON

CLUB TERMS $2.00 AT JOINING $1.00 A WEEK NO EXTRA CHARGES NO INTEREST

JOIN NOW—See how you can get a new Sewing Machine for Fall sewing. This one of the number-ships of 200 and your experience has shown you that the best is quickly filled.

THE FAMOUS STANDARD ROTARY

Has been increased in value and service by the splendid exclusive feature "Central Needle," which brings the work direct in front of the sewer sitting in a natural position—no more leaning to one side, doing away with strain on eyes and backbones. Irons and bars, lock stitch and chain stitch, and with new improvements for convenience and endurance. More for your money than ever and everything you get before. See it and try it and you will at once appreciate the "Central Needle" construction.

LISTEN! This is absolutely the lowest price at which a "Central Needle" Standard Rotary has ever been sold. Don't wait. Out of town customers send $2.00 a difference and join the Club. Free delivery throughout New England. Shown returned if not satisfactory for any reason whatever. 30-day guarantee.

STRONG RESOLUTIONS CALL ON CANDIDATES TO WORK FOR NEW LAW CORRECTING EVILS

Prominent Bostonians. Men and Women in all Walks of Life. Flock to the Historic Faneuil Hall to Voice Their Indignation Against Abuse of Employes as Revealed in the Sunday American

Among the most remarkable mass meetings in Boston ever known, held in Faneuil Hall last night, the employment of women and girls in Microscopic foundries was roundly denounced from the standpoint of a social and industrial betterment. The hall was filled to overflowing. The audience was organized meeting to the last degree—was decisive in character and action.

The employment of women and girls as crankers in foundries was emphatically condemned.

The attitude of the AMERICAN, whose headline exposure of these conditions last Sunday ignited the protest, was warmly praised.

Men and women, young men and girls—for there were many working girls in the hall—sat side-by-side with deepest sympathy to the description of the conditions in the foundries.

During the meeting, music and recitations were interspersed. The singing of hymns was particularly effective. The singing of hymns was particularly effective. The singing of hymns was particularly effective.

CANDIDATES CALLED ON FOR PLEDGES

Ford Model T Touring Car $690 Ford Model T Roadster $590

4 Cylinders - Vanadium Steel Construction - 3 Passengers. Equipped with Extension Top; Automatic Brass Windshield; Two 6-Inch Gas Lamps; Generator; Speedometer; 3 Oil Lamps; Horn and Tools -

Ford Model T Runabout, 4 Cylinders, Vanadium Steel Construction, 2 Passengers, Fully Equipped, $590. Ford Model T Town Car, 4 Cylinders, 6 Passengers, $900.

FORD MODEL T for 1912 is the same high-priced quality car as it was in 1911; the same scientifically accurate and simple design, the same heat-treated Vanadium Steel construction.

There have been no mistakes to correct—no experiments to try out—but conveniences have been added and a marked reduction in price made possible through larger production and added factory facilities.

There are no "ifs", "ands", "buts", "bluffs", nor "exceptions". 75,000 Ford Model T cars will be built and sold for 1912, because there is a demand for 75,000 Ford Model T cars. We are not estimating, or guessing, or taking chances. We know.

With a selling organization composed of 3 large reserve warehouses, 30 branches, and more than 3,500 Ford dealers, our business fingers are on the pulse of trade conditions. We know from the insistent demand, that it will take at least 75,000 Ford Model T cars to supply the wants of 1912.

This demand exists only because Ford Model T has "made good" with more than 100,000 owners. You cannot get any better evidence of reliability. Ford Model T must be a high quality car—it must be all we claim to give so very many individual owners such continuous satisfaction.

To build 75,000 Model T cars will not, in any sense, stretch or strain the producing capacity of the great Ford factory. It simply means a daily output of 250 cars. We have, during the past, frequently turned out 300 cars a day. In May, 1911, with 26 working days, our production was 6013 cars. Thus, with present facilities and our ordinary working force, 75,000 cars are but a normal production.

The Ford factory is conceded by the most famous mechanical engineers to be the most compact, concise and efficient automobile factory in the world, being equipped with labor and time-saving machinery, designed by Mr. Henry Ford specifically for the manufacture of Ford Model T Cars.

The Ford Motor Company devote all efforts to the building of one model, thus assuring a degree of efficiency, (because of continued familiarity of the employees with their work) not possible where several models are being constructed, and where the workmen are switched from one piece of work to another.

The Ford factory is running continuously twelve months in the year. The workmen are never bothered with the troublesome thought of being "laid off" for awhile. They know their employment is secure as long as they are efficient and industrious.

Still another fact lies in the simplicity of the design of Ford Model T. It is a quicker car to build because there are few parts and nothing intricate. So simple, that any ordinary individual understands it readily.

The Ford Motor Company have the financial strength to build 75,000 cars without borrowing a dollar. They will pay spot cash, take advantage of every discount and hence have the market of supplies at their command. Think of the force for low prices which the buyer commands when he goes into the market for 300,000 wheels, 300,000 tires, 375,000 lamps, 75,000 speedometers—all of the same style, the same model—and tens of thousands of tons of steel. When the seller knows he is going to get spot cash, he does business on a mighty fine profit.

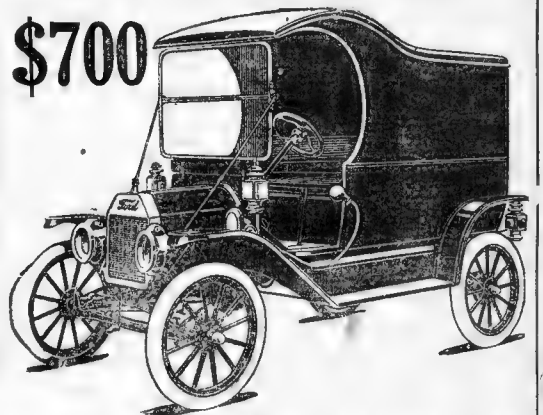

This all around manufacturing efficiency possessed by the Ford Motor Company assures the highest standard of quality with the lowest standard of price. There is no occasion to lower quality, and every opportunity to lower price.

Ford Model T is the highest quality car made in the world, bar none. A striking illustration of this fact was evidenced in a test made by the government of France in December, 1910, when they pitted the materials of the Ford car against those of the best, highest priced car made in France. The test was for "traction and shock." Ford Model T was 30 per cent. greater in elasticity, 50 per cent. stronger and 25 per cent. better under shock.

The very fact that there are now over 100,000 Ford cars in operation is the very best evidence of the quality of materials used in its construction. Go where you will, you will find more than ten Ford cars to one of any other make, and this could not be so if the quality was not in the materials used in Ford Model T.

We have the demand; we have the factory facilities and capacity; we have the money; we have the selling organization, and we are going to make and sell 75,000 Ford Model T cars for the year 1912.

Is it not the motor car you want? Prompt delivery assured

FORD MODEL T DELIVERY CAR

Here is the long-expected Business Car. Here is the answer to the demand of business men for a motor car whose reliability and economy in operation has been established. A delivery car sold at a price within the possibility of every retail merchant in every line of business.

This Ford Model T Delivery Car is no experiment. Behind it is five years of satisfactory service. The same chassis that made Ford Model T world-famous. The heat-treated Vanadium Steel chassis. The same chassis that scaled Ben Nevis in Scotland, that crossed the Continent, that climbed the steepest hills, that won in the keenest race, that has traversed the roughest roads, and over it a handsome, roomy delivery car body, that will carry 750 pounds with convenience and speed. It is a Ford Delivery Car, and that is the strongest assurance of reliability that can be given. This is the car that John Wanamaker has tried out in New York and Philadelphia; that the Bell Telephone Co. are using all over the country; that the New York Fire Department are using. A car time-tried, successful in every test—a car that will save money, because it is easy to understand, simple to operate and cheap to maintain.

REPAIR OR REPENT.

By HERBERT KAUFMAN.

You can't keep up without " upkeep." You're a machine resplendent of abuse and overuse.

Your capacity in every direction is distinctly limited. You're designed for definite purposes, and you can't do more than you're built for.

When you overspend and overload, something must give way —when you're overstrained, something must snap.

When you exceed your power, you'll smash—and repair parts aren't ready at hand.

You're strung with delicate wires—you move on exquisitely poised joints. If you're not constantly overhauled and carefully cleaned—if you're left exposed to the rust of neglect, your efficiency will decrease, your output will diminish and you'll be thrown into society's waste-pile.

Every human is both autocratic and automatic. He must manage himself and operate, in a large measure, on his own initiative.

The responsibility of maintenance rests upon the individual.
Providence has neither sufficient time nor patience to reinker men who don't care enough to care for themselves.

Every time you think, every time you move, you destroy matter.
When you tear down, you must rebuild—when you dispend, you must store in due ratio—if you consume without replacement, collapse is inevitable.

When you throw away a chance to rest, you have lost a chance to last.

Sleep is your repair shop. You'll stand on your feet only in proportion to the time you lie in your bed.

You can't get the best of Nature. She demands respect for her laws.

You can't escape the consequences of fatigue. The weight of sentence simply compounds its severity.

What's your condition?

Are you creaking and warped? How many screws have worked loose? From what sort of fuel do you derive your force?

How long has it been since you made a thorough inspection?
Is your mental tool chest up-to-date?

Take an inventory of your physical assets—you can't expect buyers to purchase dilapidated and obsolete service so long as greater speed and reliability are available.

A second-handed man has no more worth than any other second-handed instrument.

We judge your ability to manage for us by observing how you conduct your personal affairs.

If you won't guard your own welfare, it's safe to assume that you'll be even more negligent of our interests.

Before you complain of the value we place upon you, consider when you last added improvements to your brain or your body.

If you have exhausted your fund of knowledge—if your skill has died from a flame into an ash—if your strength has petered out —if enthusiasm has dried in your veins, you must expect rejection to follow inspection.

Put in fresh batteries—lubricate—rub off the rust—polish—and bring your equipment up-to-date.

If you're out of order, you're out of the running.

BREADSTUFFS NOT AFFECTED BY WAR

James A. Patten Says Conditions Are Unfavorable for a Rise in Chicago Grain.

By JOSEPH F. PRITCHARD
CHICAGO, Sept. 20.—Without the assistance of some of the powers in the Balkans, Greece, Italy and Turkey, the United States will be unable to cut grain supplies from the Black Sea to the west coast of Europe, and thus to influence the world's market of the wheat and the supporting countries abroad.

It is said that the United States will not permit the passage of grain through the Black Sea ports, and unless the Straits of the Bosphorus and the Dardanelles are closed to the grain, the supply of grain in Europe will be seriously threatened.

A conservative man in Chicago believes that the higher prices will ultimately be seen, the shortage of grain in Europe now being a hard reality, and that the price here would be a most shaped cloud.

James A. Patten is Bearish.

the station that a substantial advance in the rate of growth in output at the College is an impossibility under present conditions. He also said that there must be heavy investments in order to meet the needs of the future. He said that the College must be able to meet the needs of the future by increasing the rate of growth in output at the College. Coin a Weather Affair

THE NATIONAL COIN ASSOCIATION, which has been in existence for a number of years, is now in the midst of a campaign to secure the passage of a bill which would make it a crime to counterfeit money. The bill is now in the hands of the Senate, and is expected to be passed in the near future. The bill is a response to a long-standing demand for a law which would make it a crime to counterfeit money. Provisions will continue to pile up at the hog supply in the West, coupled with the heavy supply of meat and lard. While the hog market is still in the open, it is not likely to be a very profitable one, and there is a 12 to 15 percent chance of a rise.

Another Steel Merger.

At a time when the legality of the Steel Corporation's operation as the most powerful monopoly in the world is being questioned by the government, the corporation is planning to merge with the American Iron and Steel Co., the second largest steel producer in the country. The merger would create a new steel giant, one that would control more than 50 per cent of the steel produced in the United States. The new company would be the largest in the world, with a production capacity of 10 million tons a year. The merger would also create a new steel giant, one that would control more than 50 per cent of the steel produced in the United States. The new company would be the largest in the world, with a production capacity of 10 million tons a year.

As now contemplated, a 1

'T WAS EVER THUS--THE GROOM BECOMES "GLOOM"

By T. E. POWERS, the Famous Cartoonist

Our Jolly Club Comedians Are at It Again

BIX—What makes you so happy today?
DIX—My mother-in-law can't visit me for a month.
DIX—There's a reason, I suppose.
DIX—Yes, my boy has the measles.
DIX—Then you consider her worse than the measles?
DIX—Sure. You can cure the measles.
DIX—No man seems to like his mother-in-law.
What is your reason?
DIX—That she didn't find out before my marriage that her daughter was too good for me.
DIX—Is she?
DIX—You bet. I haven't been able to put an excuse over for months.
DIX—Why was Slim adjusted inane?
DIX—He insisted, at a banquet, that three cheers be given for Roosevelt.
DIX—Do you think he'll get another public job?
DIX—Well, they say he's a mighty good hunter.
DIX—What is the Republican party's literature regarding him?
DIX—To keep him at bay.
DIX—I don't hear of any more babies being named after him.
DIX—Parents are superstitious about a quick finish, I guess.
DIX—Do you believe in signs?
DIX—Only "Free Lunch."
DIX—Do you know what "the power of money" reminds me of?
DIX—No. What?
DIX—The Golden Rule.
DIX—What do you think of the Golden Rule policy with Canada?
DIX—None. Especially if free trade will apply to our absconding bank cashiers.
DIX—You don't hear of bank cashiers getting away with much these days.
DIX—That's because the bank presidents get there first.
DIX—Are you getting your hand playing poker?

BIX—No. I still hand out. I'm too emotional for that game.
DIX—How so?
DIX—Every time I see a queen full I flush.
DIX—That's bad.
DIX—Yes. And, as I'm married, three of a kind makes me nervous.
DIX—You don't make out, I take it.
DIX—You're wrong. I do make out and they take it.
DIX—Do you know how to avoid having a mother-in-law?
DIX—Sure. Marry an orphan.
DIX—No.
DIX—Don't marry at all, then.
DIX—No. Marry the mother.
DIX—What prompts a man to become a Mormon?
DIX—A desire to find a likable mother-in-law.
DIX—I feel bad. I passed a bad night.
DIX—I passed a bad hair and I feel good.
DIX—My brother has a strong constitution. He's been married five years and doesn't show it.
DIX—I know a man who's been married to two women for five years and dare not show it.
DIX—My brother says he won't have any children this year.
DIX—Why not?
DIX—He just celebrated his wooden wedding and doesn't want to have a blockhead in the family.
DIX—I wonder why married people celebrate their anniversaries?
DIX—They've got to have some pleasures.
DIX—They say married people live longer.
DIX—No. It only seems longer.
DIX—What do you think of a man who contributes to the support of orphan asylums?
DIX—I think he has a conscience.
DIX—Why did you give up that job as dancing instructor?
DIX—They put me on half time.
DIX—Do pretty girls make the best dancers?

BIX—They ought to. They get the most instruction.
DIX—Which would you rather teach, the stout or the slim?
DIX—Well, you don't get so dirty with a fat person. It takes longer to get around.
DIX—No one ever taught me to dance.
DIX—So I have heard several girls say.
DIX—You proposed to your wife at a dance, didn't you?
DIX—Not intentionally, though.
DIX—How's that?
DIX—I engaged her for a waltz, but she insisted I didn't say "wails."
DIX—I dare say other's had the same experience.
DIX—Don't you dare say that about my wife!
DIX—Don't get mad. I didn't mean it the way BIX—I am mad. Nid to think she didn't make the bluff work before I fell for it!
DIX—I don't wonder you fell. You had been tripping around all evening.
DIX—Why is it that a successful actor falls as a husband?
DIX—I don't know. Usually, a successful husband is a good actor.
DIX—I was an actor once.
DIX—Were you on the road?
DIX—Not until after the first act.
DIX—Comedy?
DIX—Not for me.
DIX—Were you well paid?
DIX—Not for my pains.
DIX—What did the manager say when you went for your money?
DIX—He said I got what was coming to me.
DIX—I should think the manager would be afraid not to pay you.
DIX—Why?
DIX—Because of your reputation as a "bad actor."
DIX—I know an old man who suffers dreadfully on account of his reputation.
DIX—Who is he?

BIX—A reformed counterfeiter. He can't pass the time of day without getting arrested.
DIX—Weren't you afraid to ride your horse, Lightning, after he had kicked you?
DIX—No. Lightning never strikes twice in the same place.
DIX—Do you ride as much as you used to?
DIX—No. I've been falling off lately.
DIX—What is the reason?
DIX—Falling off.
DIX—Do you ride cavalry fashion?
DIX—No. Ah, no!
DIX—Why are horsemen, as a rule, married?
DIX—There must be a "rag" in every stable.
DIX—Our police commissioner is a big grafter.
DIX—Why do you say that?
DIX—Look at all the patrolmen he has fixed.
DIX—The "fixed post" idea is brand new, isn't it?
DIX—Oh, no. The police have been "fixed" before.
DIX—Do you read much?
DIX—What kind of stuff does he write?
DIX—I mean, are you fond of reading? What kind of tales do you like best?
DIX—Ox tails.
DIX—George Washington preferred only one kind of tail.
DIX—What were they?
DIX—Lion tails with a twist to them.
DIX—Why does an ill-kept man remind one of a great author?
DIX—I don't know. Why?
DIX—Because he looks like the Dickens.
DIX—Gee! you're smart. Perhaps you can tell me when it is that an actor reminds one of a fight.
DIX—Sure. When he strikes an attitude. Got any more?
DIX—More what?
DIX—Conundrums.
DIX—I still have a wife.
DIX—Too hard for me. I'll give her up.
DIX—I wish I could.

Seldum Seezit's Joyous Job--Or, Tracking Two at a Time

CHAPTER I
"O H joy!"
The speaker was a jovial, red-faced gentleman.
He was sitting in a taxi, apparently asleep. The taxi was on a dark corner of the street.
His remark was occasioned when some one stepped into the taxi and upon his foot at one and the same time.
"Hello, who's that?"
The red-faced, jovial gentleman did not make this remark. It was the strange man who had stepped upon the foot of the red-faced, jovial gentleman who said it.
"This is me, you perturbed of dinner-or who'd s'pose it was, 'th' Akkond of Swat?"
"Beg pardon," remarked the strange gentleman, "I failed to see you here, in the dark, and you startled me for the nonce."
"Er th' nome! Wrong, Mister, my name ain't Nomes! I'm plain Bill Briggs, manufacturer 'f th' celebrated Briggs Breakfast Bunkum."
"Well, sir, I apologize. I will take another taxi!"
"Say, am I in a taxi? Hey! Tell me that," said the red-faced, jovial gentleman.
"Well, except for your head and shoulders protruding from the window you are in a taxi," replied the stranger.
"All right, I've told you my name; now to me yours," insisted the jovial gentleman.
"I'm called Mr. Briggs," ejaculated Mr. Briggs.
"I did not say anything like that," laughed Seldum Seezit, for it was indeed he, our world-famous hero. "I never use such words except when on a high-priced case. But I am Seldum Seezit, nevertheless."
"I've been looking for you. I want to hire you!"
"Well, what do you want me to do--detect some nourishment in your breakfast food? I'm only human, you know," said our hero.
"No, I want you to follow my wife!" said Mr. Briggs, a bit mixed.
"Follow your wife?" repeated Seldum Seezit. "Why should I follow your wife?"
"Why would any man follow his wife?" asked Briggs, a bit mixed.
"Because no other man's wife is handy, I suppose," said our hero, with the knowledge of a serpent.
"I don't mean me follow my wife; I mean for you to follow her," said Mr. Briggs, ignoring the brilliant repartee of the great detective.
"All right, I will follow her, but tell me why," insisted Seldum Seezit.
"I want to get something on her," said Briggs.
"What's the trouble? Is she a Salome dancer?" inquired the great sleuth.
"No, no, thunderation NO!" yelled Mr. Briggs. "Land knows she has clothes enough on her--enough for forty women. You just follow her and report to me."
"But suppose she does something terrible, like speaking to a perfectly strange clerk in a store where she is trading, or bowing to a male acquaintance in broad daylight?" asked Seldum Seezit, who was considerably peeved at the manner in which Mr. Briggs gave his instructions.
"That's it, that's it!" exclaimed Mr. Briggs, who couldn't see a hunk of sarcasm as big as a second mortgage if it fell on him. "You report everything."
"All right, I will," said Seldum Seezit, and he laughed.

CHAPTER II
"C-R-R-R-ASH!"
The sound of a collision smote the air with a terrific bang.
The detonation of two feminine screams hit the same atmosphere two terrific wallops.
The two feminine screams were from the same female.
At almost the same moment a man leaped from a taxi and glared at him.
A glance sufficed to show him that the cha-cha of his taxi had crashed into a white electric runabout and both machines were considerably wrecked.
The man was Seldum Seezit.
Once more he glared at the unfortunate chauffeur of his taxi.
"You punk-brained marble-headed imitation of a chauffeur, you!" exclaimed Seldum Seezit, "you couldn't run a wheelbarrow without exploding it. You've made me swallow a perfectly good 10-cent cigar, no more than half smoked!"
There is no denying it. Our hero was a bit annoyed.
Then he glanced at the woman in the electric runabout.
We admit, dear reader, our hero should have glanced at her first. And he would have done so under ordinary circumstances, for you know full well he is chivalry itself to the fair sex.
But, recollect, gentle reader, our world-famous detective had just swallowed a pretty good cigar. And without extinguishing it!
He was a bit overboard.
And full of deep hidden emotions.
"May I assist you, madame?" he inquired, removing his hat with one hand, but keeping his other hand over his stomach.
He almost instantly realized it was useless, he could not recover the cigar.
"I am not hurt, thank you, but if you will see if you can help me about my little car, perhaps you can fix it up so I can get back home with it."
"With pleasure, madame," replied our hero, secretly wondering if that cigar was ever going to extinguish itself.
Taking a hasty glance of her shattered runabout, our hero saw that aside from breaking the spark plug, the cooling coil, the motor fan, the carburetor, the front axle and the steering shaft, it was in perfect condition.
"Excuse me a moment," said Seldum Seezit, "and I will fix it for you," and stepping across the street, he entered a drug store and secured some string and some adhesive plaster. He also hastily drank the contents of a hand glass.
With the string and the plaster he readily repaired her machine, but the taxi in which he had been riding was a hopeless wreck.
"You are so kind," said the woman, and I fear I have delayed you. Will you allow me to take you to your destination?"
He had not gone far when he saw a policeman who he hadn't got a fish the whole time he was out, and that he thought he would move down to Florida or somewhere where the fish were more plentiful.
If that isn't an annoying way of greeting a wife, I don't know what is.
Next day, Jack was out on the bay again. He said he was after bludge. He left a blue wife, anyway.
Al, the intelligent plumber's boy, came to the house to get a hammer that he had left the day before. I thought this a waste of time until he told me that Jack would be charged a full day's pay for the job of recovering the hammer. It would have been cheaper for Jack to have bought a new hammer--or saw new one, for that matter--but Al told me that such a proceeding would be unethical and unplumberly.
Al told me that he would look at me then at a fish on the water, even if I were fish around.
"How gallant!" If only Jack--old forget about fish for a while!"
I asked Al to hope today, but he said that he might lose his job. He is just otherwise such an unchivalrous remark would not be unnoticed by him.
Jack came back in good spirits. He had nearly caught a fish of some kind.
I am not very exacting, but it seems to me that a husband in the home is worth a dozen out fishing in the bay.
I asked Al again to elope with me. Again he declined, but I think I'm weakening. Joy! Al is going to elope with me.
Goodbye, Jack!
Oh, how I hate fishing!"

CHAPTER III
"Y-O!"
Our hero was startled, although so well trained that he gave no sign, other than to start excitedly and exclaim:
"Barnham!"
It was the woman in the electric runabout.
I have been looking for you for a week, my dear. "Mr. Seezit," she exclaimed, "and tonight I was on my way to your home, having just secured the address from Mrs. Kuper."
"Looking for me?" asked Seldum Seezit.
"Looking for you," replied the woman.
"For me?" repeated our hero.
"For you," she assured him.
"Very well, take another look," said the great detective, politely.
"You please stop at my house and listen to my story. It is short, but I need you so much, and there was a world of pleading in the woman's beautiful face."
They were riding slowly through the park--so slowly, in fact, that they were in danger of being arrested for overspeeding by one of the policemen who thought he could overtake the car. But, fortunately for our hero and the woman, the policeman saw a lady cough from a nearby mansion out for a walk and he paused to talk with her.
"Mrs. Seezit," said the woman, "I will tell you what I want; it is simple enough; all I want is for you to follow my husband!"
"But why?" insisted our hero.
"Oh, it is getting so fashionable nowadays," will just out of curiosity," and the woman smiled her sweetest smile.
Then she shed a few discreet tears. Then she looked pleading into our hero's eyes and said, "Please follow my husband for me."
"Keep tabs on him," suggested our hero.
"Yes, I want to be in a position to get a divorce if I feel so inclined."
"And your name?" asked Seldum Seezit.
"Mrs. William Briggs. My husband manufactures Briggs's Breakfast Bunkum," said the woman.

NO. IV.
WHY I LEFT MY HUSBAND.
JACK is a nice enough fellow, and has all kinds of money.
I have nothing in particular against him, but I can't leave him when something more exciting turns up.
In the morning, at breakfast, I might say something about going to New York to buy a new law. I would hand over the money and say, "Don't forget to run in and buy me a gross of new books--the blue fish are biting."
In the evening I would return, and would wait for Jack to kiss me. Instead of rubbing up to me, he would say, "Go, Helen, I lost a big blue fish this afternoon. It was worth twenty pounds if it weighed an ounce."
I suppose fish all right in their place in the sea or in a chowder, but I don't find them interesting enough to talk about. As a matter of fact, one fish looks exactly like another to me, except, of course, the fat fish, which have more rotating fins than the others. The fluke seems to me to be a lowdown of the piscine world.
For two days I was alone in the house. I had gone out to tear a porry from its lair in the Atlantic Ocean, and the motor had broken down, so that I could not return. It was very lonely in the house, the only break in the monotony being the arrival of a plumber's boy to fix the tub in the bathroom.
The plumber's boy said that he had never gone fishing.
I did not take much interest in him before this statement, but after he told me this I studied him more closely.
He is a boy of ordinary appearance, and there is nothing about him to indicate that he is a plumber's lad. That is, of course, when he was not walking slowly back to the shop to get some tool that he had forgotten.
Funny thing that he never came near the house on a job without having to go back for something. I thought this indicated a bad memory, but otherwise, he has since told me that Al had every indication of developing into a really first-class plumber.
When Jack came back from his trip I naturally expected that he would greet me with some pleasant remark and a kiss. Instead of that, he merely

CHAPTER IV.
DID our hero about, or stare, or exclaim, or do any such fool stunt to exhibit his surprise when he learned that Mrs. Briggs wanted him to shadow her husband?
He did not.
"I understand perfectly how you feel in this matter," he told her.
"Not that he understood in the least, but he knew every woman delights in being told she is understood. "Then you will follow him," Mrs. Briggs asked, anxiously.
"I'll make that no more of his escapes me," replied Seldum Seezit, while his countenance was as solemn as that of a joke writer, although his sleeve fairly bulged with laughter.
And so, stopping at her home a moment and getting his suitcase containing his tools, he departed.
For four months and eleven days our hero followed William Briggs.
For four months and eleven days our hero followed Mrs. William Briggs.
Each day he would see William Briggs and would say, "Well, something important may develop any day. Tell me exactly where you are going so I may find you at a moment's notice," and Mr. William Briggs would tell him.
Then he would go to Mrs. Briggs and make her tell him where she was going throughout the day, telling her he might have something very important to tell her at any moment.
Then the next day he would tell Briggs where Mrs. Briggs had been on the previous day, which was easy because she told him herself.
The same day he would tell Mrs. Briggs where Briggs had been on the previous day, which was easy, for he told him himself.
But after four months and eleven days of this he was getting tired of the game.
"Briggs," he said excitedly to that gentleman on the eleventh day after the fourth month, "your wife is following you."
"Demmit!" exclaimed Briggs. "why is she having ME followed?"
"Search me," replied our hero. "unless it was because you talked in your sleep and gave it away that you were having her followed," and before Briggs could recover from his surprise Seldum Seezit was away to meet Mrs. Briggs.
"Why should he have ME followed?" asked Mrs. Briggs, when our hero told her.
"I got the secret from his detective. You talked in your sleep and he found it out," explained our hero.
"What will I do?" asked Mrs. Briggs.
"You don't want to be followed. Why not agree that if he will stop having you followed you will call your detective, meaning myself, off?" advised Seldum Seezit.
"Gladly," she exclaimed.
Then our hero went back to Briggs.
"I learned from the detective your wife hired all about your talking in your sleep. You better promise about your talking in your sleep. If she will call off your detective, meaning myself, it will call her detective off," advised the great detective.
"Gladly," he exclaimed.
And so it was fixed up and Seldum Seezit dropped one of the most joyous jobs in his long and exciting career as a world-famous detective.
Meanwhile, both Mr. and Mrs. Briggs exclaimed to themselves:
"What a narrow escape!"

MILK from beans is the latest discovery. (Can you imagine a fellow getting up in the morning and milking a bean?)

Now, if the scientists can only get green peas to lay eggs the food problem will be solved.

ON account of a fly epidemic, mules are wearing trousers in Kentucky.

This is not the first instance of mules wearing the pants. Many a poor married man will testify.

A HOPRO convention has been held in Washington. If they had only waited until after the next election, their ranks would have been increased by several distinguished members.

THE woman who left her husband after taking twenty thousand dollars from his bank account should not be judged too harshly. She evidently did not "leave him" much.

A authority says that modern wives are poor housekeepers, and that with them cooking is a lost art. Not quite. They all know how to roast.

MANSFIELD, OHIO, has landed a knockout blow on the chin of woman suffrage. It has decided that all women under must give their real age.

THE general manager of the Interborough has played a game in subway cars asking for suggestions to "improve its efficiency."

The million, two hundred thousand suggestions that he has a man who knows how to run a subway have been ignored.

Mercenary creature.

A SOCIETY woman says that humbly men make the best husbands. Of course, they do. They're much pleasanter to get divorced from.

It took Dr. "Jim" Flynn just thirty minutes to diagnose our case as white hopelessness.

STRANGE that Carl Morris didn't have Jim Flynn arrested for violating the "dangerous weapon" bill.

WOODROW WILSON says that we should get after the money power. That's what we're doing. We're all after the money with all our power.

A CAMPAIGN to do away with billboards is on in St. Louis. Now, if it were against board bills they would be using their energies to better purpose.

CHICAGO, they say, has fallen heir or air to what is known as the aeroplane neck. It is the same old rubber neck uplifted.

A MILLIONAIRE politician has never parried his hair. Probably couldn't do it straight.

A SOCIETY leader declares that only one hundred and fifty of the Four Hundred are really in Society. The other two hundred and fifty are living with their husbands.

DESPITE the alleged chorus girl famine, companies touring New England will have no difficulty in securing a full complement. Ninety-two million young ladies have been liberated along the Maine coast.

TAPT'S agitation for "uniform divorces" is receiving the hearty support of all the married men in the army, the navy, and the police department. Doesn't such a thing come under the head of "special privileges?"

A SMALL, white little piped with blue had been left standing on the table—a chubby little. Marie Rose poked it up, and moved perhaps by some old feminine instinct felt in her blood, she lifted it and set it on the stove. Then it occurred to her to light the burner underneath. This was becoming an adventure. Fearfully, at arm's length, she sprang the match; the little piped off over the flame with a cozy suggestion of a fat little chimney-pot at a rest. The absurd thing really had a sort of charm.

A desire to experiment further seized her. She hesitated, warning herself as her mother might have warned her: "What is this sense?" "You will only get into difficulties." "You don't want it?" Then she caught up her gloves and hurried out, as gaily busy as the sparrow who hops about to get the first share of the nesting season.

The nearest grocery delivered some fresh meat. Marie was backed at the curb; delicate cook schemes in exotic fruits and vegetables appeared behind the plate glass of the window; a gray-haired gentleman who might have been a foreign minister directed Marie Rose to the proper counter. "I want an egg," she said.

"A dozen eggs?" murmured the clerk, pencil suspended.

"No, one egg," said Marie Rose, firmly. The clerk wrote, and waited for the next item. "That is all," she added.

"Yes, madam. Where shall we send it?"

The vision of a motor truck speeding off with her egg ought to have made her smile, but Marie Rose was faintly accustomed to sorrow. She intimated with a sense of confining fear that she would take it with her, and, having paid for the foreign minister and the window display, as well as for the egg, she went home as fast as a very striking-looking young woman could permit herself to go in public.

The little was so very innocent. Marie Rose, however, made her share, none a supposition, lifted it from the little, and cautiously, brookingly dropped it in her egg. Then she laid her watch on the table and stared at it for three minutes.

Probably no one ever ate anything so gastronomically good as that boiled egg at 4 o'clock in the afternoon. She swallowed it hastily and concealed the presence of the experiment except the shell. That presented difficulties, and when Marie Rose encountered difficulties she sang a ball.

For the first time in her experience there was no bell. Incredulous, then indignant, she searched the various walls, and demanded aloud how she could get along if you could not press a button when you had need. A telephone—connecting with the office below was not at all the same thing; she could not explain to the management that she had an egg-shell on her hands. Still holding it, she opened her entrance door, with a hope of help from without.

The door of the apartment across the hall was open, giving a glimpse of a richly furnished interior—a glow of light, an arabesque of lace against a distant window. A man in blue shirt sleeves was hunched up the steps about the doorbell, and Marie Rose, accustomed to the male chambermaid of foreign lands, unconsciously addressed him.

"Will you please tell me what I can do with that?"

The face he lifted was rapidly subsided for one in his position, and large the whole man was built on a large scale. Features less bold would have been absorbed on that big frame. He thick, dark hair grew to a deep point on his forehead, retreating far back on the left, an arrangement that was curiously becoming, like some sort of a military cap. He laid down his book deliberately, as though no request could be put to him and came across to see what "that" was.

"Have you a package paid?" he asked.

"Certainly not!" Her tone implied that she was valued her egg. He smiled, not disapprovingly, but quite open, as he might have smiled down at a child.

"Oh, I think you must have," he remonstrated, a large indulgence in his voice. "Let me look!" He led the way back to the kitchen, and, at the first glimpse, discovered a closed palanquin paid under the sink board—a fair, unswollen part, not at all suggestive of the horrors that one shuddered past on the street.

"Oh, that!" But just Marie Rose held back. "I don't quite like the idea," she said. "It is no way I can burn it."

"Burn it? Good Lord, you don't want to burn it!" he cried. "It's not yours, you don't want to burn it!"

I didn't suppose they were of any use," she apologized.

It isn't that. It's the smell. It would drive you out of house and home. Didn't you know that?" He took said, gently, "A big girl like you?" and Marie Rose's head went on with the little pink dot nearest impatience.

"But I have never" Marie Rose, she pressed "How could I?" He was not listening. His one hand lifted, scanning the air like a hound's. For as CHAPTER X. Early Egypt.

EGYPT was another early spot on the map and at one time the people of Egypt were like the people of New York—believing all other places to be mere suburbs.

Menes is said to have been the first king of Egypt, but that was so long ago it is doubtful as there is not a man alive today who can remember him. He reigned about 4,500 years ago, making him older today than a cold storage egg.

At that time the River Nile was plugging along as usual from its mysterious source to its delta, but Menes became pensive about it and turned it aside from its original channel and built the city of Memphis on the river bed, but the ground there was damp and full of springs, thus proving that ped springs are no modern invention.

Then came a lady of color, an Ethiopian woman called Nitocris. Her brother had been murdered by the Egyptians and this so annoyed her that she sought revenge.

It takes a woman to conceal the very essence of cruelty. Nitocris—she called her "Nit" for short—had a subterranean hall built and invited the murderers of her brother there to dine. Then she turned back the river Nile so it would run through the subway. This so dampened the spirits of the guests that not one of them ever spoke to her afterward.

And yet, one should not blame Nit, because she did only her best. There were fewer advantages in those times. Today she could have crowded them into a subway and driven them aboard the train during the rush hour, which would have made the agony so much more delectable.

Sesostris was Egypt's most renowned monarch. He is better known as Ramses. He was a great deal like the present-day imbecile who never travels anywhere without writing his name on buildings and monuments and the like. Ramses was another of those wasp ginks who had nothing to do, and so sought to while away the time by conquering the world.

Whenever his men would capture a place Ramses would have his name chiseled on a tablet or monument. They used to write with a neat little chisel and mallet in those days—such an improvement over the modern fountain pen.

But Ramses was like all the others. Friend Death on his paid horse finally rode along and handed Ramses his bill envelope. But in his prime he used to ride about in a chariot drawn by four captive kings. What wonder Ramses was a winner! If we could hold four kings every day—but to get back to our history, one day a young man sauntered past the palace. There was a small object in his mouth, which emitted smoke. The odor caused the mummies in their cozy corners under the pyramids to sit up and howl. Ramses paled, and fled to his cyclone cellar.

"What was that?" he asked one of the guards. "That, sire, was a cigarette," replied the guard, but it was too late. Ramses was dead.

CHAPTER XI. The Sphinx and Things.

ONE of the most curious things in Egypt is the Sphinx, a massive stone image of a woman's head with the body of a lion. It is curious because, although being a woman, it says nothing. There are many resemblances to woman about this Sphinx; it has a marble heart and long claws, but the claws are kept out of sight in public.

Then, again, its lion body is of the feline family, another truly feminine trait. People travel long distance to see it and then decide it wasn't worth the bother.

Then there are the catacombs, where the mummies resort. A mummy is a dead one, having been in that condition two or three thousand years.

Some flippant writer once said: "A mummy isn't never had no fun for 3,000 years; who wants to be a mummy?" But he forgot the bright side—a mummy hasn't had to hook up his wife's dress or dodge a honk wagon for 3,000 years.

Lines Worth Reading from "Modern Marriage"

In Which Cyril Scott Is Playing

Copyright, 1911, by American-Journal Edition, Great Britain Rights Reserved.

IF a woman becomes servile one is harder than ever for a man to deal with.

MEN who are interested in women are always interesting to women.

NO modern woman can ever like another man as much as she dislikes her husband.

PERFECT honesty, especially with the opposite sex, is the distinguishing trait of modern woman.

I HAVE been undecided about women's rights, but if men are going to help us get them, I am for them.

AS long as a man realizes he has no right to ask for a thing, a woman generally is willing to give it to him.

THE affections are legitimate subjects of conversation between the sexes. They may be discussed without coyness, ardor or false shame.

YOUR old uncle Mave is a perfect matronial bureau. He not only gets people married, but he keeps them married, which is a lot more difficult.

THE whole United States is like this now—women preaching and pretending that they want to do things which they would really die rather than do.

MODERN woman uses none of the old, flattering, coquettish arts when she wishes to attract a man. Perfect frankness is her best weapon. By it she not only wins but holds a husband.

I AM sure that Eve felt that marriage restricted her development, and Adam thought he ought to be allowed outside the garden gates often. But they didn't give marriage up, nor do any of their descendants.

VERY likely I am unreasonable. Men encourage women to be. Oh, you can't have it both ways, you men! You laugh at us when we try to be reasonable. I'd you laugh at us when we are unreasonable.

CHILDREN make a woman old before her time, take her freedom, lower her before the servant in short, hinder her living. I should adopt a child. I wouldn't dream of putting my wife to any trouble about it.

I THINK that people might as well understand my position as regards men. I don't especially like them and I think very little of them. But, goodness gracious! if women want men—as they seem to—I think they ought to get it on easily, quickly and cheaply.

DON'T reproach me with being respectable middle-aged. If I was born too long ago that's my parents' fault, they were—impudent. And as for being respectable, I don't see that there is much else for a middle-aged woman to be, even nowadays.

I BELIEVE that my maid is far too pretty to be in the house. I am not vulgar; I just mean that pretty housemaids are very apt to become impudent. And, anyway, the mere presence of anything good looking around the house must have a loosening effect upon the husband's thoughts.

The pyramids are great triangular piles of stone beneath which are buried long forgotten kings; even the names of the dancing ladies who dethroned them are forgotten.

Shishak was a busy little Egyptian king who took Jerusalem and robbed Solomon's temple of its treasures. He did not take any wives, he took only only treasures.

It was only a little more than a couple of thousand years ago that Alexander the Great, at that time out for a world's record, built the famous city called Alexandria and then hired Ptolemy to rule over Egypt. Ptolemy was Alexander's valet. The last Ptolemy, about three hundred years later, married a vivacious little lady called Cleopatra.

"The same yesterday, today and forever," Cleop put the kibosh on her husband with a capital K. She made war against him, which is common enough with about all wives, but he was defeated and drowned.

"There's some class to Cleo," declared Marc Antony, when he befriended her. He had sent for her to punish her, but being a wise woman she gave-gave herself something tremendous, dined herself up and wore one of those New Thought gowns, made up of a few garments and a lot of busy thoughts.

When Marc met her he supplied so much gossip that they talk about it to this day.

Cleopatra was not a monogamist. But, after all, there is always the final settlement which is generally handed out right on earth. Cleopatra committed suicide by means of an asp, hence the expression on "Stung!"

CHAPTER XII. Modern Africa.

AT the time of Cleopatra the Romans conquered Egypt, to be walloped in turn by the Saracens, who were knocked out in the first round by the Moors, who were beaten to a frazz by the Turks. Then along came Napoleon with 40,000 Frenchmen, and when the unspeakable Turks heard 40,000 Frenchmen talking like a menu card they gave up in despair.

Of course, Cousin John Bull buttled in and beat the French at the battle of Aboukir; then the French sailed away and the Turks ruled with their customary placidity, only now and then the succulent splash of some former barren favorite breaking in upon the stulteness as, saved in a bap, she would be dropped in the river.

France now controls Algeria, with Germany casting envious glances. In South Africa the Boers were defeated by the English, and with the exception of now and then an ex-President shooting up the jungles, with camels resting along the coasts, with slaves digging diamonds, with Arabs robbing the merchants, and with the tourists stumbling around the edges per se school, all is serene in Africa.

Democrats Sure to Win State and Nation

Says Ex-Gov. Douglas

By CHARLES O. POWER.

FORMER GOVERNOR WILLIAM L. DOUGLAS says the Democrats will carry the next National and Massachusetts State elections.

Champ Clark, he says, stands the best chance of winning the Democratic nomination for President, and, in his opinion, would be the strongest Democratic candidate.

Governor Foss has done well, on the whole. The Republican party faces the practically impossible task of bringing chaos out of the disorder in their own ranks, and nothing short of a miracle can save their State ticket, the former Governor declares.

The defeat of reciprocity in Canada, the failure of the Republicans to reduce the tariff and the speeches that President Taft is making are big, essential elements that will figure in the Republican party's national defeat.

Although Mr. Douglas is out of politics for good, so far as being a candidate for office is concerned, he is taking a deep interest in vital issues, and yesterday gave me a most remarkable interview. It was more of a talk than an interview. That is, I asked a few questions and the former Governor did the rest.

It is a talk that will interest every man who gives serious consideration to political questions, and will particularly impress the business man. It is the viewpoint of the man who has been politician and statesman—member and chairman of political committees, Mayor of Brockton, State Senator and Chief Executive of the Commonwealth.

"Governor Douglas, the readers of the Sunday AMERICAN would like to know your views on politics," I said to him, "and I wish particularly that you would tell what you think of the first State-wide, direct primaries. Were they a success, do you think?"

"It is claimed for direct primaries that they minimize the power of the machine and the boss, and, if that is so, they are a good thing in theory. Perhaps the first attempt would not be a fair test of their efficacy in practice. In another year, when they are better understood, they may be patronized better. The day was against them, but, in spite of that, the number of voters—as large as could reasonably be expected."

"How about your future politically, Governor? It has been said that you might take an active interest in politics again."

"I shall never be a candidate for office again. I am out of politics for good. I am 66 years old, and the remaining days of my life I shall devote mostly to travel. In a few days I go to Colorado for a month, and, after that, to the South for a while. I could not be dragged or cajoled back to public life; I am enjoying my private life too thoroughly."

"The people have treated me handsomely politically, far better than I deserved. I appreciate that fact very much. While I could not be tempted to enter the lists again as a candidate, I do not intend to cease taking a deep and serious interest in the questions that affect business and the welfare of the people."

"You have asked me for my views. Briefly, I think the Democrats will carry the next State and National elections. I don't think the Republicans have much chance of beating Foss. They will make a desperate effort to get together, but I do not think they can make the successful effort this year."

"The principal candidates for the Democratic nomination for President will be Speaker Champ Clark, Governor Harmon of Ohio and Governor Wilson of New Jersey. I think Clark will win. In my opinion, he would be the strongest Democratic candidate."

"Speaker Clark is from Missouri. Geographically, that will be in his favor. More than that, he is a level-headed man, knows the business needs of the country and is a strong man before the people, being a fine orator. Harmon has done well as Governor of Ohio, but he does not possess as many elements of strength as Clark does. Woodrow Wilson may be all right, but he has not been long enough in the game. He would not be an objectionable candidate, but he would not be so good a one as Clark."

"Taft has only one possible chance of re-election. He must stop toadying to the insurgents. There was reason to believe that he would not pursue the course that Roosevelt did, but, from the very first, he has been alternately on and off that course. He has lost the confidence of the commercial interests of the country. And every day he makes a speech he drives these interests farther away from him."

"Unless business confidence is restored, and that quickly, there will be a worse state of panic than we have had since 1900. The general business of the country has fallen off 25 per cent. since that year. Roosevelt, with his probes and threats of probes in 1907, almost precipitated an awful panic."

"Taft, with his talk and his Wickersham threats of probes, is precipitating another. What the country needs is not that kind of talk, but a strong, bugle-blast message from the President that it is his purpose to do everything possible to give confidence to the business man."

The following are some striking statements made by former Governor W. L. Douglas in an interview with a Sunday AMERICAN reporter, discussing State and national affairs:

I don't see how the Democrats can help winning this State election and the next National election.

Champ Clark has the best chance of being elected President of any Democrat.

President Taft hurts his chances every time he makes a speech.

We ought to give direct primaries another trial to decide whether the people want them.

Something must be done to restore business confidence or there will be a severe panic.

The Sherman law should be repealed in such a way that big corporations would not be afraid to develop.

We need more statesmen and fewer politicians.

We need more trade ships and fewer warships.

We need a new banking system that would help to avert panics.

"We Are Now on the Verge of a New Alignment of Political Parties, the Conservative and the Radical"

"All Who Believe in the Slogan 'Steady Work' Will Be Conservatives, Insurgent Republicans and Democratic Faddists Will Compose the Radical Party"

"Wickersham says he has many big corporations to investigate and would like to have the business men get together and devise some way to settle the whole matter up. That's perfectly absurd. Why, the business interests dare not make a move now, for fear of running afoul of some law they did not know about and landing in court."

"The Sherman law should be repealed so that it could be more clearly understood and more properly applied. The big corporation has come to stay. Modern business conditions demand it. It ought to have the right to buy out other corporations, not for the sake of shutting down plants, but to include them in their scheme and operate them profitably."

"The cry is that big corporations wipe out competition and should be regulated by law. It is a poor rule that does not work both ways. Now, suppose for instance, that there were two railroads, competing lines, in front of this factory and that I wanted to ship 1,000 cases of shoes to Chicago. Why shouldn't I have the right to ship them by the line that would do it for the lowest rate? That would be competition for business. Under the law it would be criminal for the railroads to bid for that business and for me to attempt to induce them to do so."

"But, you say, that would operate unjustly against the small shipper. I don't think so. Railroads are so harassed by law and regulation now that they cannot develop as they should. They are held back and not encouraged to develop, and, under this system, all shippers are hampered."

"Taft is alienating the business interests. He cannot hope to get the insurgents. There is only one thing that can save him, and that is the conservative vote of the country. In my opinion he will not try to win it. He is lacking either in the wisdom or the courage. Just now, he is more of a politician than a statesman."

"We need more statesmen and fewer politicians. That has been said before many times, but it is pertinent now. We must have new parties if the business of the country is to be saved and conserved. A new alignment is coming. To-day there is no Republican and no Democratic party, strictly speaking. The insurgent Republicans are nothing more nor less than radical Democrats. They are of the same beliefs and theories. They will come together in a new party, the radicals, in a few years."

"And the other party, the Conservatives, will be composed of the business men and the workmen who want less political excitement and steadier employment. They may not win the first battle, but they will win the second. They must, if the country is to go forward and meet the demands of the times."

"The party whose slogan is Steady Work will be the great party of the future."

"The Republican party will be defeated at the next National election because it will not have that slogan. Of course, the Democratic party will not have it either, but it will offer greater promise of good. The people have come to the conclusion that the first step is the defeat of the Republican party, and then the new line-up of forces."

"The Democratic party will not adopt that slogan because of the fear of offending the theorists and faddists in the party. The Democratic party cannot get rid of that element, because it thinks that, some day, it will get something from the party."

"I was reminded of these Democratic faddists during my trip abroad this Summer. I was standing at a little distance from Vesuvius, watching the smoke coming from the top of the crater. I noticed that a number of houses were on the side of the volcano, and asked the guide if the people were not afraid to live there. He told me they were living on in the hope that some day they might realize something from their holdings."

"If reciprocity had won in Canada, Taft might have gone before the people on that issue with some hope of success. Now he is denied that hope. The great issue of the next National campaign will be the tariff. What are the Republicans going to tell the people, to explain their failure to reduce the tariff? They say they have appointed a tariff commission and that there is going to be a scientific readjustment of the tariff."

"I don't take any stock in that tariff commission. Experts, indeed! Well, I would rather trust to the judgment of members of Congress than to experts, so-called. They say they are going to take up the schedules article by article and determine the tariff on each one separately. That is all bosh! How are they going to do it on the finished product? They cannot, for example, consider merely the things of which a shoe is made. They must take into consideration everything connected with the plant, the lumber in the buildings, the paint, the machinery, the parts of the machinery and the tools; and they must consider the things that go into the shoe merely as they affect the shoe, and not as they affect the manufacture of some other article in which they are used."

"Protection to a certain extent is a good thing. But there is such a thing as having too much of it. They gave us shoemakers free cattle hides and said we ought to reduce the prices of shoes. That is but a very small item. If they would lower the duties on other things, so that we could get cheaper cloth, thread, nails, sole leather, kid and so on, we could cut down the prices materially. The shoe industry is not afraid of the competition of cheap foreign labor. Our system is so much superior to the European system, our workmen are so much more skillful and our managers so much more expert that we could more than maintain our own and continue to pay the highest wages in the world. And we could give the people better shoes for considerably less money."

"I am sorry about the hostile spirit that was manifested in the Canadian campaign. Taft's statements did not help to promote better feeling. And that annexation talk was very bad. We ought to have reciprocity with Canada. There is no reason why there should be a commercial wall between the two countries. The great duty of our government is to promote more friendly relations with other countries."

"Let us have more trade ships and fewer warships."

"Let us try to get into the markets of the world."

"Trade means peace. So, by all means, let us have all the trade we can handle."

"State issues and conditions, you ask? Before I take them up let me mention two more matters, one of which is very significant and the other very important. The first is the effect of the defeat of reciprocity. Since Canadian election day I have received a strong appeal from the Municipal Board in Canada, urging me to come up there and start a factory, the inducements being a fine site, low taxes, cheap labor, immunity from labor disputes and a tariff of 20 per cent. on American shoes, soon to be imposed, I am informed. I am not going, but the appeal is significant, isn't it?"

"The second is the need of a new banking system in this country. We must have one on better lines than our present one if we would help to avert panics of the future. The Aldrich plan is a pretty good start, but it seems to be handicapped by the name. That ought not to count absolutely against it. There ought to be a strong central bank, and the wise statesmen will push it along."

"Now, then, State issues. Remember, I am out of the game and I am giving you the views of the business man who has no personal or factional feeling in the matter. On the whole, Governor Foss has done well. I don't see how they can beat him. They will have to get together in the Republican camp in a big hurry if they seriously attempt to do it."

"The tariff will be the big issue of the State campaign, I suppose, although the Governor has many good ideas of his own."

"Governor Foss's bill to tax the income from personal holdings was a good measure. It should have passed. It would have meant a more equitable personal tax. It would have relieved many rich people from the necessity of committing perjury when the assessor came around. It would have kept men and wealth in the State that have left it. He ought to make much of that bill in his campaign. He ought to explain it to the people and they would be quick to see its advantages."

"And Governor Foss appears to have had good counsellors. His judicial appointments were splendid. He has lived up to the best tradition of the State in that respect and has honored the office he holds. He has kept politics out of the courts and maintained the high standard of our judicial integrity."

"Really, I don't see how the Democrats can help carrying this State election and the next National election."

Mr. and Mrs. William S. Fitzsayer, who have closed their season and are now at their estate, are to spend the coming season in New York where they have taken East Seventy-ninth street. Mrs. Fitzsayer will go to New York about Thanksgiving.

The Walter H. Stevens are leaving Hill place after a delightful spend at Foxcroft, Hamilton. Mrs. Robert Bacon was hostess of a beautiful dance given by the Stevens in the night. Mrs. Bacon's daughter are shortly leaving for France and Mrs. J. Pierpont Morgan, Jr. is coming with their family, leaving for the winter season. The young daughter of Mrs. Henry S. and Miss of Mrs. Stephen Van Rensselaer and Mrs. Boylston Deal, are WINCHESTER.

The various Catholic organizations in the city have united in planning a grand anniversary of Columbus Day to celebrate the five hundredth anniversary of the discovery of America. Since that time the city has taken part, while in particular years, in the various organizations in Bristol. Even high mass will be celebrated at Mary's Church at 9 a. m., followed by a sermon by Rev. James Connelley, D. D., of the University of Virginia. Several thousand men will be present. Mr. and Mrs. George W. Smith, of the city, have been selected to give the address on Tuesday evening at 8 o'clock on Grove street. A meeting of the men of Bristol was held on Monday to arrange for the parade. The parade will be held on Wednesday at 10 o'clock. The subject of the address will be "Columbus and the Discovery of America," given by Rev. Walter J. Smith, of the University of Virginia.

POVERTY- THE GREAT CURSE

These Hands Represent the Grip of Poverty, the Grasp in Which Debt Holds You, the Powerful Curse That Keeps Men Miserable and Anxious. Poverty Is Slavery. Fight It.

Copyright, 1911, by the Sunday American Journal.
DANIEL R.

UNG men, and old men, fight poverty as you would fight slavery if it still existed among us. Ask the old around you, and they will tell you that poverty is the great, widespread curse.

Not wealth is necessary to happiness, but freedom from the poverty that grinds, poverty that worries, poverty that makes a man the slave of any man that has a dollar—THAT is necessary to happiness.

You have seen pictures of the slave-traders rushing through the African forests and the poor blacks fleeing before them in terror.

What the slave-catcher was to the black man on the Gold Coast in the old days of slave-ships poverty is to you to-day.

If you are young, and the dollars slip through your fingers, and you feel that the future will take care of itself, just look at this picture and think about its meaning for a while.

The grasping hand of poverty is above every man; every man lives in danger of this powerful clutch unless he has regulated his life with the greatest wisdom—unless he actually lives to-day in such a way as will make it impossible for poverty's grip to seize on him.

Davenport, who made this cartoon, intended that it should represent especially the grasp of the mortgage on the home. He had in mind as he drew it, that deceptive, easy, widespread sort of misfortune and weakness which takes the place of a mortgage to be paid off later.

The word "mortgage," which means

"a death pledge," is indeed a curse upon many homes and many lives. It makes men and women and children homeless. It turns out old age into the streets. It is merciless and cruel as in the old, primitive times, when death itself could be made the penalty for failure to pay the death pledge.

Death in thousands of cases would be more merciful, less painful, than the mortgage against which men fight year after year, paying out interest, struggling, hoping, and at last giving in.

Keep out of poverty—keep out of debt.

Remember that the dollar you spend so quickly to-day, and the other dollar to-morrow, and the day after, will mean later independent manhood, power to control your own time, direct your own career.

Money enough—though it be but ten cents a day more than you actually have, means slavery now, anxiety, humiliation in the future.

And poverty, debt, the spending of ever so little more than you actually have, means slavery now, anxiety, humiliation in the future.

Poverty deprives children of education—and so it means ignorance.

Poverty deprives children of care and good food—and so it means disease.

Poverty takes away men's courage, drives them to despair, makes them seek relief wherever it can be found—and so poverty means drunkenness.

Wherever you find men miserable, poor and underpaid you will find ignorance and drunkenness.

Wherever you better conditions and lift the weight of poverty, drunkenness and ignorance diminish.

Whatever your age, or habits, or condition, there are two things that you can do—you can better yourself, or you can make things worse.

If you are a young man or woman starting out in life, or one young enough to have many good years ahead of you, it is absolutely in your power to make your life dignified, independent and satisfied.

However old you may be, or discouraged, it isn't too late to fight against the curse that weighs on millions of men, the curse of present poverty, and that other curse, almost as great, the dread of poverty in the future.

It is in your power to be free if you will do it. Spend less than you make, and you will find that spending less means, in almost every case, earning more.

If a man puts into learning and thinking the hours and the vitality that he puts into frivolous spending he will soon find his power to earn increased.

You must remember, however, that if the majority of men are worried, hard up, living along from day to day, it is because going in debt is very easy and keeping out of it is difficult.

Every day the temptation comes to spend this and to spend that.

On a certain day everybody must have a new hat, and goes and gets it—he thinks he must spend as much as anybody else does—there goes one chance of saving.

Each man thinks that he must dress as well as somebody else does.

And a million young fools think that they must take a drink when it is offered to them—and also that they must buy a drink in their turn, which is idiotic.

And tens of thousands of married men are kept poor because they imagine that they must do as well as somebody else does—and too often their wives help them to keep poor.

Try to bear in mind that a few years from now it won't make much difference to you whether you got a new hat on September 15th, 1911, or not—but it will make a very big difference at that time whether you have a few thousand dollars saved up or a few dozen men trying to collect bills from you.

Remember that when you are well off, when you can say truly that you owe no man a dollar, people always like the way you look. They find no fault with your dressing.

Remember that all the varnish, all the fine clothing, new hats, new shoes, can't do you a bit of good when you and everybody else know that you can't afford those things.

It isn't easy to save and be independent. If it were everyone would be prosperous and independent. But it is possible to keep poverty away.

It is possible to be a free man, afraid of no one, controlled and bossed by nobody.

It is very difficult to make an impression on the average man. This picture certainly will attract attention. And we hope that for some who see it it will be remembered as the beginning of wise living, of determined self-control.

This article appears to-day in two millions of Sunday newspapers—in New York, Boston, Chicago, San Francisco and Los Angeles.

Probably ten millions of men and women, at least, will hold in their hands and see the two millions of newspapers in which this picture is published.

Beyond any question, of the ten millions a great majority, even among those that are still young and have every chance, will miss the chance, let it drift by, treating their money and their hours in a spendthrift fashion.

Many a man will see this article to-day who, if he could see it again, twenty years from now, will wish with bitterness of heart that he had paid attention to it and realized that it was intended for him.

Free live happy, independent, free from the control of other men—and a great majority live with this pair of hands always above them, in fear of the future, pinched and anxious in the present.

However, unless you are willing that it should be so, there is no reason why you should be a poor man, living in slavery and anxiety, ten years from now.

You can be free if you will. It is in your power to say to yourself: "I may not be rich, but I will never be poor. I'll earn all that I can in the present, and I'll save so much of every dollar for the days that are to come."

You would have a very poor opinion of the savage on the Gold Coast if you found him, when the slave drivers were abroad, thinking of anything except escape from those slave hunters.

And ninety-nine out of a hundred know what poverty means, but ignore the knowledge.

They know perfectly well that if they cannot save and begin to get ahead to-day there is no earthly reason why they should have to do that at a later day—yet they ignore that knowledge.

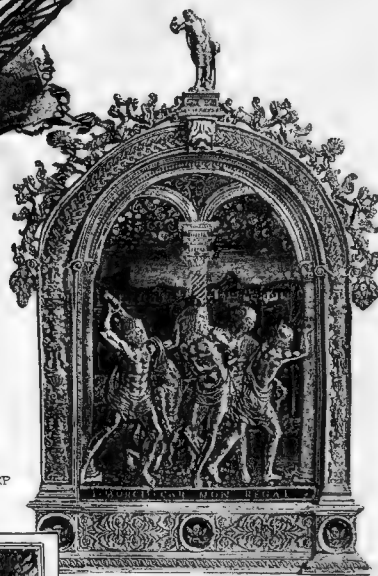

And of all those that see this picture many will feel the grip of these big hands—don't let the hands grip YOU.

J. PIERPONT MORGAN, America's greatest financier, has just published privately, at enormous expense, a superbly illustrated catalogue of his collection of jewels, edited by Dr. G. C. Williamson, an English scholar. Some of the most notable examples are printed on this page.

As you read this volume you cannot help wondering "How did he get them?" for it gives a glimpse of many extraordinary mysteries, partly revealing how these gems passed from royal and noble hands into those of a private collector.

Gems which have belonged to nearly every reigning house in Europe and nearly every famous family are represented here. Romance, crime and mystery cluster about every one.

Especially puzzling is it to understand why Mr. Morgan should be in possession of the exquisite green jade cup mounted in gold, which was at one time in the collection of the Empress Frederick of Germany. It is the work of Jacopo da Treviso, the greatest master of this form of art during the Italian Renaissance, and is described in Dr. Bode's catalogue of the Empress's treasures. Why is it not in the possession of her oldest son, the present Emperor William? Was she or her son compelled at any time by poverty to part with this great treasure?

Most romantic is the story connected with the golden chain of honor of the Elector Christian II. of Saxony. It is composed of thirty pierced ovals of open scroll work, decorated with enamel, and was the favorite ornament of the Elector, whose descendant is now King of Saxony. It dates from 1606.

The chain passed into the possession of a junior member of the family, Henry of Gumbrecht, and was buried with him in his grave in the Sophien Church, Dresden. In 1740 the grave was opened and the chain taken and deposited with the treasures of the royal family in the Green Vault, Dresden. In 1908 it was removed to save it from falling into the hands of How to Tell the Difference Between the Edible Mushroom and Its Poisonous Counterfeit.

WITHIN the past few weeks over fifty persons in Greater New York and surrounding towns have died from eating poisonous mushrooms. In practically all of the cases a lay mushroomer, misled by the victims themselves, and their unfortunate experience suggests again the great danger involved in gathering mushrooms without the necessary knowledge to distinguish between the edible and the poisonous varieties.

There are many hundred varieties of mushrooms. The great majority of them are harmless, some of them may be placed in the "doubtful" class, while a dozen of them are known to be deadly poisonous. There is no infallible rule to distinguish between them. It is only by knowing all of the varieties that cultivated mushrooms, as distinguished from the field mushrooms, and here is no possibility of mishap. They may be eaten with impunity.

The same cannot be said, however, of the mushrooms sold in the poorer quarters of the city. These are the most part, are field mushrooms, and there is danger in buying the poor.

There are many fallacies regarding this universally loved delicacy. It is supposed, for instance, that it is never make mistakes in gathering them. As a matter of fact, there are several varieties of poisonous mushrooms here which are closely resembling edible and the most part, are field mushrooms, and there is danger in buying the poor.

There is a magnificent silver gilt pax, which belonged to Cardinal de Noailles, a member of the celebrated family of that name. The pax bears a figure of Christ and a handle at the back, with which it may be shown to a worshiper to signify that he is worthy to receive the Eucharist. The Cardinal was a cousin of Caesar Borgia, reputed to be the greatest power of his time. He lived in constant dread of his cousin, and was slain by him in 1519. The pax many times and proved to be saved from his enemy. The Cardinal presented it to the Cathedral of Montreuil. In 1521, and from there it passed to the Cathedral of Tarragona. When the latter cathedral and the present convent were destroyed by a soldier of the Napoleonic troops in 1808, the pax, as well as many other objects, was stolen. This operation enabled a great American millionaire to acquire it. It was sold by the King of the house of Bourbon-Orleans. The Count was rich, and a number of children, of whom a subject is the Duke of Orleans. It is conceivable that any of these children of the Duke of Orleans, or any of his descendants, might have sold the pax to a collector of art.

Escoffier, the Greatest Chef in the World, Begins His Series with a Dozen Recipes for Cooking Rabbit

By A. Escoffier

THE meat of the rabbit, whether of the wild or farmyard variety, may furnish many nourishing and attractive dishes for the modest household. It is especially suited to families where economy is important, because it is a low-priced meat. Whatever praise is due against this meat must be attributed to lack of knowledge of how to cook it.

Wild rabbits are abundant in most parts of the country, and the farmyard rabbit is a very easily bred. The farmyard rabbit is a very useful animal to the man who tries to use a little produce as a help to his income from some other occupation. I must warn my readers against allowing farmyard rabbits to feed on cabbage leaves, of which the animal is quite fond, as this gives the meat an unpleasant flavor. The wild rabbit is by preference an aromatic herb, and where they are abundant the flesh consequently has an excellent flavor.

The best way of cooking rabbit is undoubtedly to saute it. I therefore recommend everyone who values the art of keeping house economically to master this method. Sautéing gives rabbit most of its greatest palatability, lending it piquancy. It is in itself and even improving the flavor when it is actually unpleasant.

Among the styles of rabbit which I can recommend are rabbit sauté, rabbit sauté, sauté with tomatoes, sauté à la crème, sauté à la maitre d'hôtel, sauté à la bordelaise, sauté à la provençale, sauté à la lyonnaise, sauté à la nantaise, sauté à la rouennaise, sauté à la toulousaine, sauté à la bordelaise, sauté à la provençale, sauté à la lyonnaise, sauté à la nantaise, sauté à la rouennaise, sauté à la toulousaine.

Other favorite methods of cooking rabbit in France are roasted in the oven, or on the spit, broiled with bacon and broiled, a la saute, broiled with bacon and broiled, a la saute. It is also prepared in a soup with carrots.

AFTER having cut up the rabbit, heat two ounces of butter and add the pieces of rabbit. Cover the saucepan to allow the meat to harden slightly without taking color. A few minutes are sufficient for this preparation. Then add salt and pepper, a large onion chopped up, a bundle made up of parsley, a bay leaf, a piece of garlic peeled, the whole well tied together.

Sprinkle the pieces of rabbit with two tablespoonfuls of flour. Stir with a wooden spoon so that the flour may not stick to the bottom of the saucepan and to keep it thin. Moisturize with about a quart of hot water. As soon as the liquid is boiling put the

THIS is the first of a series of recipes for the rabbit, which is the most popular of all the game animals in the world. The rabbit is a very useful animal to the man who tries to use a little produce as a help to his income from some other occupation. I must warn my readers against allowing farmyard rabbits to feed on cabbage leaves, of which the animal is quite fond, as this gives the meat an unpleasant flavor. The wild rabbit is by preference an aromatic herb, and where they are abundant the flesh consequently has an excellent flavor.

Rabbit Sauté With Mushrooms.

SKIN a young rabbit, clean out entrails carefully and cut it in pieces. Put the liver aside, heat two ounces of butter and add the pieces of rabbit. Cover the saucepan to allow the meat to harden slightly without taking color. A few minutes are sufficient for this preparation. Then add salt and pepper, a large onion chopped fine, a piece of garlic the size of a small pea, a dozen peeled mushrooms, three tomatoes peeled and chopped, with seeds removed, a good sized pinch of chopped parsley, a glass of white wine. Cover saucepan and finish cooking at a moderate fire. If the rabbit is young, fifteen to twenty minutes will be sufficient cooking.

Rabbit Sauté With Tomatoes.

AFTER cutting up the rabbit as in the first recipe, warm in a frying pan some olive oil, butter or lard. Add the pieces of rabbit. As soon as they are nearly cooked through and are beginning to brown, season them with salt, pepper or a bit of garlic, and two or three chopped shallots. Add several fresh sautéed mushrooms, a glass of white wine, two or three tomatoes skinned, seeded and chopped up, and a good sized pinch of chopped parsley and tarragon. Cover the saucepan or frying pan and let cook for fifteen or twenty minutes.

Rabbit Soup With Curry.

TAKE a young rabbit, slice up three large onions, put them in a saucepan in which you have heated two or three ounces of butter. Let the onions cook at slow fire for fifteen minutes, add rabbit cut in pieces. Allow it to cook for five or six minutes more. Add two large soup-spoonfuls of curry powder, two quarts boiling water, half ounce of salt, a fagot of parsley, a bay leaf and a mix of garlic. Allow to boil for thirty to thirty-five minutes. Take out the pieces of rabbit, put them in the soup tureen and pour the cooking liquor over them, after having passed it with pressure through a strainer with large holes. Add a few tablespoonfuls of rice cooked in salted water.

Pilaff of Rabbit.

HAVING cut the rabbit in pieces, put it in a saucepan in which you have heated two or three ounces of butter or lard. When the meat is slightly browned, season with salt and pepper and add a medium sized onion chopped up. Allow it to cook ten minutes, then add five or six soup-spoonfuls of good rice soup. (Rice used in soup is parboiled in water for ten minutes and after water is drained off clear consommé is added.) Moisturize with about 1 1/2 quarts boiling water and reduce by boiling. Cover pan and finish cooking in oven, or on a slow fire twenty minutes.

Curry of Rabbit.

CUT up the rabbit as in preceding recipe, and put the pieces on a sautépan in which you have heated two ounces of butter or lard. As soon as the meat is lightly cooked, season with salt and pepper. Add two medium sized onions chopped up, allow the whole to cook about fifteen minutes at a slow fire, add two soup-spoonfuls of good curry powder. Moisturize with boiling water in quantity sufficient to cover the pieces of rabbit. Cover the saucepan and finish cooking at a slow fire for twenty or twenty-five minutes.

Broiled Rabbit.

FOR this dish you throw aside when cleaning the rabbit, the neck, the breast and the shoulders, break the bones in the fat part of the legs and cross the legs. Salt slightly and moisten with melted butter, and then broil. The time of cooking should be about twenty minutes. After about fifteen minutes cooking sprinkle with roast bread crumbs and moisten again with butter. In serving surround the rabbit with broiled bacon. At the same time serve some kind of vegetable.

Roast Rabbit.

AFTER having skinned and cleaned the rabbit, tie it in the oven or spit. Moisturize during the cooking with lard or butter.

Giblotte of Rabbit à la Ménagère.

PROCEED in the same way as in rabbit giblotte, but use a small rabbit, and add a few potatoes cut in quarters. You may add red wine instead of white wine in this recipe.

Roast Rabbit.

Rabbit Sauté With Mushrooms.

SKIN a young rabbit, clean out entrails carefully and cut it in pieces. Put the liver aside, heat two ounces of butter and add the pieces of rabbit. Cover the saucepan to allow the meat to harden slightly without taking color. A few minutes are sufficient for this preparation. Then add salt and pepper, a large onion chopped fine, a piece of garlic the size of a small pea, a dozen peeled mushrooms, three tomatoes peeled and chopped, with seeds removed, a good sized pinch of chopped parsley, a glass of white wine. Cover saucepan and finish cooking at a moderate fire. If the rabbit is young, fifteen to twenty minutes will be sufficient cooking.

Rabbit Sauté With Tomatoes.

AFTER cutting up the rabbit as in the first recipe, warm in a frying pan some olive oil, butter or lard. Add the pieces of rabbit. As soon as they are nearly cooked through and are beginning to brown, season them with salt, pepper or a bit of garlic, and two or three chopped shallots. Add several fresh sautéed mushrooms, a glass of white wine, two or three tomatoes skinned, seeded and chopped up, and a good sized pinch of chopped parsley and tarragon. Cover the saucepan or frying pan and let cook for fifteen or twenty minutes.

Rabbit Soup With Curry.

TAKE a young rabbit, slice up three large onions, put them in a saucepan in which you have heated two or three ounces of butter. Let the onions cook at slow fire for fifteen minutes, add rabbit cut in pieces. Allow it to cook for five or six minutes more. Add two large soup-spoonfuls of curry powder, two quarts boiling water, half ounce of salt, a fagot of parsley, a bay leaf and a mix of garlic. Allow to boil for thirty to thirty-five minutes. Take out the pieces of rabbit, put them in the soup tureen and pour the cooking liquor over them, after having passed it with pressure through a strainer with large holes. Add a few tablespoonfuls of rice cooked in salted water.

Add a few tablespoonfuls of rice cooked in salted water.

Pilaff of Rabbit.

HAVING cut the rabbit in pieces, put it in a saucepan in which you have heated two or three ounces of butter or lard. When the meat is slightly browned, season with salt and pepper and add a medium sized onion chopped up. Allow it to cook ten minutes, then add five or six soup-spoonfuls of good rice soup. (Rice used in soup is parboiled in water for ten minutes and after water is drained off clear consommé is added.) Moisturize with about 1 1/2 quarts boiling water and reduce by boiling. Cover pan and finish cooking in oven, or on a slow fire twenty minutes.

Curry of Rabbit.

CUT up the rabbit as in preceding recipe, and put the pieces on a sautépan in which you have heated two ounces of butter or lard. As soon as the meat is lightly cooked, season with salt and pepper. Add two medium sized onions chopped up, allow the whole to cook about fifteen minutes at a slow fire, add two soup-spoonfuls of good curry powder. Moisturize with boiling water in quantity sufficient to cover the pieces of rabbit. Cover the saucepan and finish cooking at a slow fire for twenty or twenty-five minutes.

A LITTLE WIDOW IS A DANGEROUS THING

Newport, Sept. 28.
 Mrs. French, one of the handsomest and richest widows of New York, so "Yes" to that modern Congress of International Society, James J. Van Alen and thus cause his charming daughter, Miss May Van Alen, much amusement of mind, negative all her step-mother's strataegies and battles, and destroy once and for all time Mr. Van Alen's fondness for widows.

In the clubs on Fifth avenue and in Newport odds are three to one that she will win.
 There have been many widows in Mr. Van Alen's life. Of all kinds there have been a baker's dozen. All have been pretty.

Mr. Van Alen, son-in-law of the late Mrs. Astor and oldest brother in law of Colonel Jack Astor, is a most desirable party. He has money and lands, stocks and bonds. He owns a grand old manor in Newport, a palace in New York and a castle in France. He is so rich he can wear a monocle and an old Panama hat. He keeps a flock of sheep to crop his Newport lawns, and he could have his driveway with diamonds if he wanted to.

The widows who have interested him have known all this. It looked good to them.
 Miss May Van Alen who values liberty and papa as she does the money, too. A little of the dangerous thing, an eternal vigilance is the price of freedom, words to that effect. Oh, the times daughter has had to such papa's romantic journey.

There, for instance, was the beautiful Countess Fabrice, beautiful and lovely as any pearl ready to fall into his mouth. Success seemed ready to perch on his brow when William K. Vanderbilt, senior, appeared as a rival in playing one against the other the lovely Countess lost both. At the poor Countess!

She has since remarried herself, but she is the only one of James J.'s widows to do so.
 When the Fabrice episode closed James J. came back to Newport. "I'll try widows," he said, but they must be home bred.
 In Newport he found the sumptuous Mrs. Vanderbilt. This was a great find for James. Mrs. Vanderbilt's husband had died, leaving her one son and several millions of dollars. Some of this money she spent in building a genuine French chateau on Bellevue avenue and in developing some wonderful gardens.
 Mr. Van Alen looked upon her and found her good. He likewise found a rival on the doorstep, Mr. Ekeston Whitthrop, senior.
 Oh, the fun Newport had! The two well-dressed dandies struggling for the smiles of the charming widow!
 James J. was tremendously interested. He courted the widow in daylight and moonlight. He fairly lived in her lovely rose garden, where there was a second home for him. Mr. Whitthrop blushed every time his rival made. The widow had two steady cavaliers, and apparently enjoyed it.
 The fun, but drivers evened the fun. They would stop their buses in front of the chateau and shrill, "Here lives the Widow Vanderbilt, who can have Jimmy Van Alen if she wants him, but she also likes Pete Whitthrop!"
 This is actual fact—or was until the police stopped it. Have you ever heard the bus drivers at Newport crying out these to the married couples? No?
 Just when all seemed propitious for "mum," Mrs. Herman Orléche appeared on the scene and so humorous bus drivers changed their tune! "Here lives the Widow Orléche, who let Mrs. Herman Orléche take Jimmy Van Alen away from her!"
 The season closed. Mr. Van Alen returned to England still uncaught and unweary. And there he found widow number 1—the dazzling, dark-eyed brunette, the fascinating

Mrs. George Law James J. tell under the thrall of those eyes. When she had James J. then.
 History repeated itself. As he felt that his freedom was slipping away, just as he felt that those eyes, and the fascinating manner of Mrs. Law had him tight in called Daughter May, and the day was saved.
 Mrs. Van Alen finally removed papa to Rushton Hall, the gorgeous country place where papa was supposed to live.
 "There is a houseparty down there," said Daughter May, "and there are two widows there if you must have them."

Yes, there were two widows, but Miss Van Alen was only pulling her ardent father out of the frying pan and throwing him into the fire. In that houseparty were Mrs. Ava Willing Astor and Mrs. Billy Leeds.

Papa had known the beautiful Mrs. Astor since her childhood. She had been the wife of his wife's brother. He admired her tremendously. He began to single her out for his distinguished attention.
 Oh, no! Oh, no! Daughter May was furious. But Daughter May was helpless.

But say! Who is this coming cally to the rescue? Who is this who says gently on erring papa and make him better. In his pursuit of the lovely divorcee? Mrs. Billy Leeds, if you please!
 Mrs. Leeds, in diamonds, war paint and gold leaf. Mrs. Leeds, with her blue eyes blazing with excitement and her figure as short as ever was thin.
 Mr. Van Alen hesitates on one side the beauty and charm he knows, on the other an married field. On one side the woman he will have to work hard to get, on the other the woman who is working hard to get him! He goes over to Mrs. Leeds and once more counsels that he is lost!
 At any rate that house party at Rushton Hall will long be remembered! Mrs. Leeds got her innings and it looked like wedding cards for several weeks.
 What broke up her plans? Daughter May! When things had gone far enough Miss Van Alen developed appendicitis and to devote himself to his daughter.
 Mrs. Leeds returned to London. Mrs. Astor remained, but carefully could never marry her late husband's brother-in-law.
 And some added memories five and six to his widow's collection.
 Within twelve months there have been four widows added to Mr. Van Alen's collection. And four particularly pretty ones. There was that altering, that oh, so beautiful Mrs. Pedar Bruguiere, who rushed across Newport's streets last Summer. Before her hand even I, I, went down with a shiver. He openly deserted his own friends, he pledged to keep engagements. And all for the beautiful Mrs. Bruguiere who had been the widow of the divorcee court! Oh death, where is thy sting?

Mrs. Bruguiere's smiles were fought for by half a dozen well-known Newporters. And because of this, the ladies, bless 'em all, were amazed. Daughter May was most substantially a widow. She was peevish, and one expected to see her mount a galling gun on the lawns of Wabchester and fire at all comers.

But Daughter May did not actually have to fire that gun. Mrs. Bruguiere, after having the time of her life, both in the Newport dunes, showed her decided preference for another man and left Papa with her picture and a mingling feeling in his heart.
 And where could Papa find comfort? Right at his own gateway! He turned to Mrs. Elsie French Vandorville. Mrs. Vandorville might have been his granddaughter.

Alas for James J. Mr. Vanderbolt as a child had been taught to show respect to her sisters. She checked Mr. Van Alen on a year with her grandfather and was awfully nice to him. But Mr. Van Alen did not want to be treated like a grandfather, and he went off to London in a huff.
 With his lacerated feelings needing expert surgical treatment, he met, in England, two charming blondes, Mrs. Henry Redmond and Mrs. Seth Barton French. He had known them both in their early days in Newport.
 In England they were very good to him. He called at Charlie's one day to get comfort from Mrs. Redmond and he trotted over to the Savoy the next to get comfort from Mrs. French. These were busy days for Mr. James!

of London and of comfortable Mr. James, she went to Paris and worse than all, she told him that she would not come to Newport this season! Oh, ye tears!
 Mrs. Redmond when she married of London went to New York, telling him she could not spend the Summer in Newport.
 But the last two widows reunited both Mrs. Redmond and Mrs. French did appear in Newport the former lived on board her steam yacht Sultan.
 Yes, Mrs. French spent two weeks at Wabchester. And Daughter May was perfectly polite to her. And papa? Ah, let us not give papa away! He grew twenty years younger! He was beautiful!
 What comes next? Both Mrs. French and Mr. Van Alen are to spend October at the Hot Springs.
 And the odds are very good now three to one!
 Oh, the great widow and the man!

A New Race Created in the Very Heart of Civilization

The "Jackson-Whites" Newest Experiment in People-Making Throw from

"The Lady of the White Hair"—Mrs. Francis Wheaton, the Wallisley Professor, Who Has Lived for Ten Years on the Mountain Top.

IN the Ramapo Hills, a stone's throw from New York, a new race of men is in the making. Other races reckon their existence by ages; this is the product of a single century. Other races have had vast stretches of territory in which to develop; this has had one lonely, wild mountainside. Other races number their herds by the millions; this has less than two hundred.

The new race has a name—a name as curious as itself—the Jackson Whites. Of its origin the name, more hereafter. It is made up of the combined blood of Indian, African and a dash of Caucasian, in which Hessian predominates. It has in its short existence passed through every phase of its greater brothers. Primitiveness akin to that of the cavemen; a lower culture than each of the three races forming it. Next, bitter war of self-preservation against its surroundings; a patriarchate, a nature worship of its own; class counsel and clan judgment; a chieftainship; interdict against mating with "foreigners" and consequent inbreeding; self-isolation, comparable to that of the Japanese before Perry opened Japan.

Take the map of New York, place the point of a compass on City Hall, draw a circle with a radius of fifty miles. This is the theoretical "heart of civilization" in the East. Within this circle the new race is developing! That is the most astonishing part of it all!

The Jackson Whites occupy the Hovenkopp Mountain in the Ramapo. The name is a survival of the Hessian part of them. It means High Head or High Top. The mountain is some eight hundred and fifty feet high, is partly in Bergen County, New Jersey, and partly in Rockland County, New York. The border line between the two States runs through the mountain—a fact which has been of great aid in the perpetuation of the race, because the lawless could always quickly cross out of the jurisdiction of the particular State seeking to punish them for some crime. The New York portion lies within the township of Suffern, where Thomas P. Ryan and other millionaires have built magnificent homes worth many millions of dollars.

The existence of the Jackson Whites on Hovenkopp has, of course, been known to the nearby residents for years, but up until the past two years no official cognizance has been taken of them either by the authorities of New York or New Jersey. Scientists, not knowing the ethnological treasure so close at hand, have made no study of them.

Like one of the Lost Tribes, the Jackson Whites have lived in their log cabins, scattered and hidden in the wilderness, very high primal in thought and habits while New York was clothing itself with skyscrapers! The opportunity, however, will no longer be overlooked. To improve upon nature's tardy process of natural selection has been the dream of evolutionists ever since that process began to be understood. Long before Luther Burbank succeeded in evolving new varieties of plants and fruits by mixing the stocks, scientists dreamed of producing new types of men in the same manner.

The project has had its difficulties. It is one thing to experiment with vegetables, or even animals, but another to do it with human flesh and blood. As yet science has dared to do no more than conjecture upon possibilities and to hope for a time when enlightened public opinion will counterbalance the sacrifice of the freedom of a few human beings for the betterment of mankind in general.

But nature on Hovenkopp has for a century been patiently working out the experiment the scientists did not dare make. The result is now to hand with all its latent knowledge ready to be brought out for the benefit of mankind. An expedition from the Carnegie Institute at Cold Spring Harbor, is now on its way to spend the winter on the mountain for the purpose.

The Jackson Whites are white. Their next folk are of a peculiar old ivory tint that has no resemblance to Indian or negro nor of a white cross breed. It is not unusual to see a white with perfect negro features—and the night is somewhat disconcerting. The type of the new race is exemplified by the boy whose picture is printed on this page. He resembles none of the three races going to make him up. A comparison by Dr. Alanson Skinner, of the Department of Anthropology, American Museum of Natural History in New York, is given fully, however, on another part of this page.

Strange enough there are many albinos. One family has had three within the past ten years. The proportion of albinos in the hirsutis seems to be fully 5 per cent, an enormous proportion, the cause of which will be one of the most interesting problems the scientists will study. Despite the presence and the intermarriage with a number of full blood blacks on the mountain, the new racial type shows steady increase. The boy whose picture has been referred to is of a pure black mother. One sister is whiter than he. Another is entirely black.

Investigation of the origin and history of this unique mountain clan is difficult because of the ignorance and the suspicion that is one of the primitive traits of the people. From the best sources of information available, it has been ascertained that the Jackson Whites are the offspring of three races, as follows:

THE Delaware Indian, including the Peacock and Hackensack tribes, of whose blood the Ramapo Hills formed a part.

The African Negro, including the pure Congo blacks escaping from slavery in the South, and later freed slaves from the North.

Caucasian, including four authenticated deserters from the Hessian troops during the Revolutionary War and a small scattering of Dutch settlers and fugitives from justice.

The name "Jackson-Whites" is a puzzle to philologists. It is the generic term. There are no Jacksons and no Whites in the colony. Perhaps the best explanation is that given by De Groat, the head of the Jackson-Whites.

"Where do you get your name Jackson-Whites?" he was asked.

"Because we're blacks and whites," he answered.

Grimm's law of the interchange of consonants has nothing which explains the transposition between bl and j sound. Nevertheless, it is possible that such a transposition took place. It has been suggested that some of the slaves, secured from a man named Jackson, and had, by the custom of their time, taken his name. There is, however, no record of such an occurrence, and the fact that there are no Jacksons in the clan seems to argue against it.

The influence of the Hessian and Dutch upon their mountain descendants is apparent not only in their complexions, which in many instances are practically white, but in the names they bear. Of the entire mountain population 85 per cent here the names of De Groat, De Friess, Van Duik and Mann respectively.

The influence of the Indians is seen in the features of the Jackson-Whites and in their straight black hair. Their temperaments, too, are strongly akin to that of the red man. They are stoic, cunning and suspicious.

Of the influence of the negro upon this concubinary race there is little to be said. Many of the characteristics of the race appear among the Jackson-Whites. Their utter disregard of marital ties and duties and the loose morality generally prevailing among this mountain clan must in large measure be attributed to the large negro element in their blood.

Near the summit of Hovenkopp Mountain there lives today a Jackson-White named Bill Mann. Because he is typical of the new

At the time of the Hudson-Park I went through the region in question, but made no party the Jackson-Whites.

That this tribe is the product of Dutch and negro ancestry is correct. The intermixture of the two is very evident in their physiognomy.

Taking the face of Charles Mann, for analysis, it is a point out the features which are of the three races from which he came.

The height from the eye to the skull is characteristic of the Dutch. The head is well shaped, and the contour it shows the effect of strain in the boy. It is of the long, thin jaw was typical of Indian tribes, from one or two of the Jackson-Whites are probably of the Delaware.

The negro factor manifests itself under-lip and the parting of the teeth, although in other respects suggest the Indian. The nose is straight, which was of many of the Delawares.

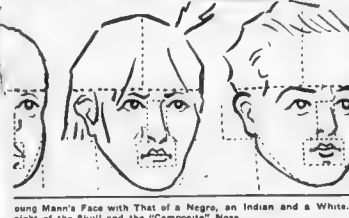

The chin, too, is pointed like the Indian. The eyes are neither negro or white or Indian, although not as high as typical red men, are more was a negro hillman named Charles Mann, and he it was who won her. They lived together in the mountain until her death and brought up thirteen children, twelve of whom had children. Bill Mann was one of them. In his early childhood Bill was a typical savage. The blood of three races flowed in his veins, but his nature was more primitive than that of any of them. He grew up to the rugged mountain with- out the advantage of a single civil- izing influence. When he was old enough to marry he chose one of the negro girls of the hills. They had several chil- dren. One of them is the boy Charles, now 12 years old, shown on this page.

The Jackson-Whites. Like other Primitive Peoples. Depend Upon the Mountain Goat for Milk. The Milk is Charles Mann's Cousin, Another Type.

Mann's sister, Elizabeth, married a negro named Conklin. Their two sons, Lillian and then, were adopted five years ago by Francis Wheaton, the well-known artist, and his wife, who came to Hoven- kof Mountain ten years ago and established themselves in a cabin at its summit with the express pur- pose of living with the Jackson- Whites and attempting to civilize them. Some account of the work which the Wheatons have done is given in another column on this page.

This short account of Bill Mann's family history will serve in a gen- eral way to explain the derivation of all the other Jackson-Whites. There are now about a hundred and fifty of them living on the mountain. There are about sixty of them bearing the name of Mann, forty named De Groat, twenty named Van Dunk and fifteen named De Fries.

Through intermarriage they are nearly all related. The loose code of morals formerly existing among them, and still prevailing among many of them, was responsible for a very unique state of affairs. The Mrs. Van Dunk of today became the Mrs. De Groat of tomorrow and the Mrs. Mann, perhaps of the day after. It was simply impossible to keep them pure. Men, women, children and women lived together as husband and wife just as long as was convenient. When they were tired of one another they parted with- out any ceremony and without any regard for the children of these temporary alliances. The children sustained themselves as best they could, living in the cabins of whomever they loved and working for their living.

There was no law recognized among them except the law of "might makes right." Technically, of course, these hillmen came under the jurisdiction of the States of New Jersey and New York. Practically, however, the authorities of neither State ever bothered them. Even when they committed crimes on the hills, as they frequently did in the wilder days gone by, no effort was made to apprehend them. It was extremely rare for the State officers to find it almost im- possible to secure evidence against him because of the chieftainship of the hillmen, who were reluctant to testify against their guilty tribesmen. "Let them kill each other off," the authori- ties declared. "It is better for the State and as effective." And no murders and punishments of the bad men of the hills have gone by red with blood were allowed to live their lawless lives without molestation. Mr. Francis Wheaton, who came from Chil- case, and his wife, who was formerly a pro- fessor in Waller College, first entered the

LIVE IN NEW JERSEY?

Relics 400,000 Years Old Which Tell That Humanity Was There Before the Glaciers.

PROBABLY the most important discover- ies ever announced in the field of American archaeology are contained in the newly published fifth volume of the re- ports of the Peabody Museum, Harvard Uni- versity. In this volume Ernest Volk, of Trenton, N. J., publishes the evidence he has discovered showing the existence of man at the time of the glacial epoch in the Delaware Valley. This means that man existed in America at a prehistoric period which has been placed by geologists as far back as 400,000 years. It means that the early American was among the first men on earth, instead of being a comparatively late comer, as the majority of scientists had maintained. During the last twenty-five years Mr. Volk has explored hundreds of excavations made by himself and others on the banks of the Delaware River, which in prehistoric ages was two or three times its present width. He points out that the characteristic soil forma- tion of this region consists of (1) a layer of black soil on top when the Indians, who were here when white men first came; (2) below this the yellow drift, deposited by the glacial streams after they had melted, and (3) lowest still, the gravel which was brought down by the flow of glacial ice. Mr. Volk has unearthed large quantities of Indian relics in the black soil. Below this, in the yellow drift, he has found human bones and relics of human workmanship of an absolutely different and very primitive type. Finally, in the glacial gravel, he has found human bones and stones that appear to have been worked by man. Mr. Volk presents an enormous amount of evidence to prove that the human remains he found in the yellow drift and the gravel could not be confused with those from the top or Indian layer. This is the point on which the former controversy on this subject chiefly turned. For instance, he says that any in- strusion from the black soil into the yellow drift leaves a mark as plain as black ink on white paper. Moreover, any breakage of the drift is perfectly plain to a geologist, partly on account of the red horizontal streaks which run through it, he says, "penet- rated and the underlying yellow soil dis- turbed and intruded upon by the Indians through the digging of graves, pits, hearths, caches, ash beds, post holes, etc." The trenches were at the extreme east end of the Lator Farm, near a row of easseas trees, known as Easseeas Lane. Here four- teen graves were found. Then he began to examine the yellow drift laid down by the close of the glacial period. The first relics of human workmanship of this period he describes were found at the Lator Farm. Here he found a workshop of argillite tools six inches down in the yellow drift, and beneath another 18 inches of black soil. "It contained," he says, "under a flat slab of argillite, a beautiful slender argillite spear head; also several chipped argillite boulders, argillite chips and a number of quartzite pebbles, broken by fracturing. No charcoal, burnt stones or traces of fire were found. The yellow soil was not disturbed below the workshop, nor was there any connection be- tween the workshop and the black soil." Then came the finding of human bones in the yellow drift on Dr. Abbott's farm. On April 21, 1935, says Volk's report, "two distinct heaps of human bones were found. They were six feet below the present surface, and rested upon a stratum of whitish sand, coarse, clean and sharp, six inches thick." The implements he found in the yellow drift were all of argillite, a kind of slate, and of two kinds only, one for penetrating, the other for cutting and scraping. They are entirely different from the Indian stone im- plements, which are made of chert and jaw- per and many other materials and show a high degree of workmanlike skill.

A New Reconstruction of Earliest Man by Joseph Krupka, the Distinguished Sculptor, Made from Measurements of Prehistoric European Skeletons. The New Jersey Man Was Much More Advanced in Type, Resembling the Man of Today.

And now we come to the discoveries in the lowest and most ancient stratum of all, the glacial gravel. The interesting dis- covery in this formation was a bone which was identified at the American Museum of Natural History as the skull of a muskrat. This was found ten feet two inches down. Then, while examining a new railroad cut south of Deuville, Mr. Volk made his most remarkable discovery. "I saw some white object," he says, "partly covered by the sand which was still running down from above. The object (a bone, as I found it was, after picking it up) was one foot inward from the face of the bank. . . . I picked it up; there were two pieces, a large and a smaller one; picked up the larger one first, then the smaller came to view; picked this one up, too, the larger piece touching the little pebble on the left. Now I took careful measurement and found that this bone was seven feet seven inches below the present surface in a stratum of sand two feet thick, one foot inward of the present face of the bank between two little pebbles. "After the bone had been sent to Professor Putnam for identification it was found to be part of the left femur of a human being that had been cut off square at one end. The carpal structure had been gouged out to enlarge the opening and it had been per- forated in two places; had apparently been the handle of some implement." Six days later he found another fragment of human bone—part of the parietal bone of a human skull, twenty-four feet west of the 6-foot and ten feet east of a polished pebble, apparently worked by man.

A Symbolical view of the Great Comet of 1811, Which Will Not Reappear Until the Year 4876. Drawn by H. Lanos. This comet has such an immense orbit that it takes 3065 years to accomplish its journey. Civilizations have grown and crumbled during one revolution of the comet. The picture illustrates the meaning of this enormous flight of time to earth—from civilization to living Paris.

Why Science Is So Interested in Our Latest "Spectre from Space" Which May Bear Elements Unknown to Earth

By Harold Jacoby
Rutherford Professor of Astronomy in Columbia University.

IT is quite possible that readers of this newspaper will expect an apology from the present writer venturing to report in these columns with an article about comets after trying the public patience so very severely not long ago when the famous comet of 1843 passed close to our earth. On that occasion it was predicted that the comet's approach to the earth would be so close that our planet, carrying its human beings upon it, might actually pass through the cometary tail.

The writer warned American readers in advance that even if the event should occur, probably no one on the earth would be able to detect the presence of cometary material in the terrestrial atmosphere because the long tails of these bodies are always so excessively tenuous or thin in structure that they are altogether imperceptible to our senses.

In spite of this warning, people submitted what we know about the new comet. It was first seen by astronomer W. M. Brooks from his observatory at Genesee N. Y. on July 20 last. It has since been frequently observed from various parts of the earth, and from these observations, by methods well known to astronomers, it is possible to calculate its orbit, or path, in space. This is a task which cannot yet be regarded as thoroughly finished because, in comet orbiting, which observations have been possible, it is still very brief and the precision of our calculations always depends on the length of time that comet has been under observation.

If we have been able to watch it while completing a considerable fraction of its path we can, of course, extend our knowledge of the remainder much better than we can if only a short arc of the orbit has been observed. This would be the case if human senses and instruments made by human hands were infallible. With actual existing conditions of fallibility, slight errors of observation always occur and these produce their minimum effect, as we have said, if the part of the orbit has been observed. Allowing, then, the possibility of later corrections, in the light of later observations, we can nevertheless set forth the present state of our knowledge. We find that this new comet is probably pursuing an open orbit, unlike the famous Halley comet, which returns to the solar system once every seventy-six years or so. The reader must first keep in mind some idea of the relation between an open and a closed comet orbit. In the open curve, the comet first approaches the sun and the earth's orbit as shown. It comes from outer space—we know not where—from what we might call the home of the comets. It is visible to man during a short time—perhaps a few months—while it is going through that part of its path which is near the sun and the solar system of planets. On the other hand the closed comet, the so-called periodic comet, returns again and again to our star, showing itself each time it has completed a circuit of its orbit.

This is the reason we have called the present article "A Comet Which Can Never Come Back." New Yorkers must say goodbye to it on the present occasion. If held of the comet another opportunity to see it has to wait.

Last night the writer made a special effort to find it, he looked in the next direction, but was unable to be sure of the comet on account of the glare caused by street arc lights and the never-falling haze of the city atmosphere. Yet reports received this morning from astronomical friends in the country indicate that the comet was easily visible last night wherever the atmosphere was clear. It appears more or less like a hairy star.

Having thus explained what we know of the comet, the final word is in order about the comet itself. Dr. Brooks began his astronomical work as an amateur, and speedily fixed his principal attention on the arduous work of comet hunting.

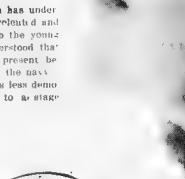

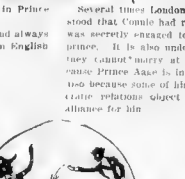

During his thirty years of practice, he has found no less than thirty comets previously unseen. This record may be called unique. In all probability it stands unequalled in the annals of astronomy though this science, above all others, is need for the self-sacrificing devotion of its disciples. Nevertheless astronomers can duly appreciate the rights of rest and the never-ending disappointments that must have accompanied the above distinguished record. At home to Dr. Brooks.

The Beautiful and Wistful Miss Connie Stewart, Who May Become the Wife of King Frederick's Danish Prince Aage.

OH WHAT A ROYAL LOVE CHASE!

All After a Pretty Actress--and the End--a Royal Cabbage Garden

London, Sept. 26.
Miss Connie Stewart continues to receive offers and advances from the leading actors and actresses in the theatre and to receive herself to marital copulation with that royal truck farmer, Prince Aage Christian Alexander Robert, eldest son of Prince Waldemar of Denmark.

As Waldemar, the young prince's father, is brother of the present King Frederick, it will be seen that this most persistent of royal love chases must cause ripples of interest right up to the foot of the English throne. Thus why, for two long years, has pretty Connie, one of the most charming of London footlight favorites, sprouted so cruelly, always a pair or two out of the reach of her royal suitors?

Is it that Connie Stewart cannot see herself in the light of a truck farmwife, even with royal hogging and wedding at her side?

For that is the other stalling passion of Prince Aage—raising flowers and vegetables on the estates of his father, the most democratic of royal princes. And Aage himself is doubly democratic, his remarkable mother having also trained him thus, though she is a Bourbon princess, daughter of the Duke of Chartres—in spite of which she is principal owner and manager of a line of ocean steamships.

The first time that Prince Aage really got his mind off vegetables was when he saw pretty Connie, in a cunning bathing suit, breasting the waves at a Dutch watering place on the North Sea. Presto! The royal love chase was on. Since then vegetables have not been wholly neglected, but they're certainly that lady could hardly be time to present a royal prince to her niece, but that was as far as Aage got for many months. Connie didn't seem to fancy him.

Prince Aage promptly took advantage of the democratic principles of his whole family, and began a royal love chase that had no sign of royal or even noble strings attached to it. He chased pretty Connie in his mother's boots, he chased her in his own automobiles, he sat in a piebald front seat at the theatre where she played and flung roses at her wife the footlights.

Several times London has understood that Connie had refused and was secretly engaged to the young prince. It is also understood that they cannot marry at present because Prince Aage is, in the main, too because some of his less democratic relations object to a stage alliance for him.

But if it is left to Prince Waldemar and to Prince Aage's mother there is little doubt in the minds of London society that Connie Stewart may become a Danish royal princess whenever she can make up her mind to take up royal truck farming matrimonially and seriously—for everybody knows that when Aage has caught Connie, and the long chase is over, it will be back to the farm for him.

My Secrets of Beauty

No. 144-HAVE YOUR OWN
PERFUME - By Mmc.
Lina Cavaleri, the Most Famous Living Beauty

By Mmc. Lina Cavaleri

IF you use perfume choose one that expresses you. Use it judiciously and use no other. Rather puzzling advice this? Let me explain. There are perfumes that express you. For instance, there are kinds of fragrance that suggest and harmonize with the blonde. There are other of the fragrant odors that belong exclusively to the brunette. This is no whim, but a fact with a foundation in science. A practical perfumer who was also an eminent chemist once expressed a surprise at my choice of violet essence for my toilet table. But violet is the note I exude. But violet is the note I exude of a woman.

But it is not you," he retorted. "You are individual enough to dress your hair in the way that is becoming despite the fashions. Why not have the same courage as to perfumes?"

What is my perfume?" I asked.

A bouquet," he answered. "That is a compound, a mixture of many perfume, as, for instance, after of rose."

TODAY Mme. Cavaleri gives advice about a subtle subject, the use of "perfumes that express us." She advances the novel theory that one sort of perfumes should be used by blondes, another by brunettes, and for this she gives a satisfying scientific reason. She advises the choice of one perfume and tells the reader how to make this perfume seem an actual emanation of one's self.

"Uncover the rose jar when you want a room to be fragrant."

"Sew sachet powder in the reverse of your jackets."

the black spot on the cheek close to the eye, or if she have a fine staid nose, the beauty is placed close to that. Now you can use your handkerchief for a purpose for which it was never intended. You perform the act as though you were merely dabbing your face. That is the time you do not wish to attract attention. Yet with the appearance of your handkerchief to perfume on it is diffused, and catches attention. Attention to your face is common with many others. I can tell the perfume used on a handkerchief is wasted.

If you like perfumes use them but moderately, never to excess. Men profess not to like perfumes but do not let that deter you. I have found that is an error. Men with most men, and that in fact, like a suggestion of perfume. A hair about a dust, never as being to the draperies in the apartment. One of the most charming means have a hint of perfume about it, to have a rose in the mantle or bookcase. It is now and then when you want it to be especially fragrant. Burn incense, the Oriental, the domestic sort. That is, the scented tablets that are delicate enough I do not advise exposing the fresh air of a room to the frequent or plentiful use of them. A little sachet powder may be used into the hair of a woman. It may be sewed into the lining of soft cushions. It is to perfume the apartment. I often open the doors of the apartment which have not been opened for some time, and the perfume of fragrance soon give the room a sweet odor.

If you add a little pepper or a few cloves to your sachet powder it makes the perfume stronger and more lasting. A crushed stick of cinnamon not only serves this purpose but it is hygienic, purifying the air. The physicians of ancient days used it as a disinfectant.

To drive away a hurtful and disagreeable odor like the odor of a bottle of cologne about the room is a formula by which you can keep your own.

Oil of orange... 15 grams
Oil of cedar... 14 grams
Oil of lemon... 14 grams
Oil of bergamot... 10 grams
Oil of lavender... 7 drops
Oil of clove... 4 drops
Oil of cinnamon... 8 drops
Tincture of amber... 5 drops
Oil of neroli... 2 drops
Tincture of musk... 4 drops
This formula is a useful one to the brunette girl, especially one whose favorite flower is the Jaque which rose.

Purified red rose petals... 2 ounces
Carmine... 10 grains
Tincture of musk... 10 grains
Mix with these enough equal fragrant to shape them into little balls. Pierce them with a darning or knitting needle.

This is a charming, old aromatic that can be used as a burning candle or bath perfume, or takes the place of toilet water. A small dropper into the water in which you wash your hands perfumes them and scents the room.

Some girls choose as their favor the perfume one that harmonizes with the idea of their favorite color. The girl who likes blue chooses the violet, and so on. It is as simple as selecting the scent of lavender, and the girl who surrounds herself with yellow chooses the orange or citron scents, as the girl who likes the fragrance of the carnation favors carnation. Her own rooms in pink, besides nearly always appearing in this color or having some touch of it in her costume.

Alcohol... 150 grams
Oil of rose... 10 decigrams
Ambergris... 5 grams
Musk... 4 grams

Oil of aster... 25 centigrams
Musk... 12 centigrams
Russian Eau de Cologne... 12 grams

Blondes should select a specific perfume. That is, they should adopt a perfume that is made directly from a flower or that imitates the odor of a single flower. For them the violet is the ideal perfume.

"Let the oil or lotion used for massage be perfumed with a few drops of your favorite fragrance."

"Sprinkle a Little of the powder among your stationery in your writing desk."

Mmc. Lina Cavaleri

Signorette, lily of the valley, bell flower, orange blossom and rose geranium and carnation are perfumes for the blonde.

This formula also can follow with good results for an individual perfume.

Oil of orange... 25 centigrams
Russian Eau de Cologne... 25 grams
Heliotropine... 25 centigrams
Oil of amber... 5 grams

Having selected your perfume arrange to always convey a suggestion of it. Let your cold cream or the oil or lotion used for your body be perfumed with a few drops of it. Let your handkerchiefs filled with it in your pocket, and your gloves and wraps, and keep one in each of your hat boxes.

If you use liquid perfumes sprinkle them upon your clothing, not your skin. The exhalations from the skin "lift" the fragrance. The garments retain it.

Sprinkle bath powder containing the perfume toilet water scented with it, into the tub. Or use bath tablets fragrant with it.

Place sachet bags or sprinkle

GROW SPONGES

Immediately Below Is Shown How the Artificially Reared Sponges Look When Attached to the Triangular Concrete Tiles Upon Which They Are Grown. How Science Plans to Replace the Wild Sponge Which Is Rapidly Becoming Extinct

Sponge culture. The methods shown at St. Louis are somewhat more elaborate than those devised by Dr. Moore, but the difference is substantial. The principal difference is that the cuttings grow at St. Louis on a concrete disk, while at St. Louis they are attached to a concrete disk.

The number of sponges produced in a given area of suitable water can be multiplied many fold by the use of the concrete disk. In deep water divers can implant fresh cuttings on the sponges without regard to the disk from the bottom. In shallow water it is better to use the disk on board of the boat on which the work is done, and drop them over after reaping the cuttings. This is carefully done, and they will always land right where they are wanted.

SPHERES, after many years of experimentation, has found out how to breed sponges—to rear them that is to say, cheaply and on a commercial scale.

It is high time, inasmuch as the natural source of supply are rapidly giving out. For some time past sponges have been rising in price. Each sponge of good quality costs four times as much as they did twenty years ago, and the flower of gold sponges (such cuttings of luxury from my lady's toilet) have gone up almost out of sight, the best being worth $50 a pound.

These fine toilet sponges come from the Mediterranean. But they have been caught for market faster than nature could replace them. Even the little ones have been rare, and the price of the sponges has risen accordingly.

It is the same way in Florida where there is a great sponge fishery. The sponge fishery in Florida is the only sponge fishery in North America. It produces in those waters the finest both sponges in the world—of even better quality than the bath sponges of the Mediterranean.

But they are being wiped out by reckless over-fishing, and soon there will be none left. Are we, then, to look forward to a spongeless future? Unquestionably, yes—unless we go to work at once to grow sponges. The natural sponge grows in the water, and it is the job of the grower to cultivate the sponge. It has been a wild animal, we are about to reduce it to the condition of a domesticated animal.

Until recently it was a question whether such a thing was possible. Now it is a fact. The problem may be said to have been fully solved. The Florida Fisheries Bureau says that there is money in sponge culture, and that the establishment of extensive and profitable sponge farms in Florida is only a question of time.

A Harvest of Dollars For You

On November 10th the subscription price of Cosmopolitan Magazine will advance to $1.50 per year. Good Housekeeping Magazine will also advance to $1.50 per year on the same date. Until that time the subscription price on each magazine will be $1.00 per year.

Hundreds of thousands of people will subscribe for these two magazines before the raise in price. Hundreds of thousands of people would subscribe if the matter were merely brought to their attention.

We want representatives everywhere to secure subscriptions for these two magazines. Our inducements are the most liberal ever offered by a magazine publisher. We will pay a very liberal commission, monthly salary, and will also distribute a large amount in extra cash prizes.

One of our representatives has averaged over $425.00 every month for the past seven months. A number of others have made from $200.00 to $400.00 a month. They say that their success is due to the fact that it is easy to sell people what they want, and everybody wants Cosmopolitan and Good Housekeeping.

If you have selling ability enough to sell gold dollars for twenty-five cents each, you can make a lot of money right now securing subscriptions for our publications. No such opportunity was ever before presented to you. Previous experience is unnecessary. Many beginners secure as many as thirty subscriptions the first day.

It will cost you nothing to give this work a trial, as the necessary supplies are furnished free of charge.

Now is the psychological moment to fill out the coupon below and mail it to us.

Consumer Demand is the Greatest Dealer Influence

In the operation of any advertising medium, therefore, it is essential that the advertiser know to what extent the publication in which he buys space can influence the public at large, and whether or not that public can be reached that it can be served by him with profit.

This AMERICAN SUNDAY (Monthly) MAGAZINE SECTION is distributed with the New York American, Boston American, Chicago Examiner, San Francisco Examiner and the Los Angeles Examiner into more than 2,000,000 homes each Sunday—a greater quantity of circulation in the profitable areas of merchandising than can be secured through any one other publication.

Now it is reasonable to believe that a publication which regularly reaches a greater number of readers than any one other publication, would in an advertising sense wield a stronger influence with the reader than any other publication. And

In this issue of the AMERICAN SUNDAY (Monthly) MAGAZINE appears the announcements of seventy high grade National advertisers.

Each of these seventy advertisers paid at least $5.00 per line, or $70 an inch, for the space his advertisement occupies.

Each of these seventy advertisers bought the space used by him only after he had been convinced by substantial proof that the AMERICAN SUNDAY (Monthly) MAGAZINE can, through these more than 2,000,000 homes it influences, create a consumer demand, and create that demand at a profit to himself.

Now, there are many more than seventy National advertisers whom the AMERICAN SUNDAY (Monthly) MAGAZINE can serve with profit. It is these advertisers who should closely listen to and investigate the advertising story of this great popular periodical.

Why! The New Love Serial By The Author of Three Weeks

by ELINOR GLYN

Chapter I

PEOPLE often wondered what nation the great financier, Francis Markrute, originally sprang from. He was now a naturalized Englishman, and he looked English enough. He was slight and fair, and had an immaculately-groomed appearance generally—which even the best of valets cannot always produce. He wore his clothes with that quiet, unconscious air, which is particularly English. He had no perceptible accent, only a deliberate way of speaking. But Markrute! such a name might have come from anywhere. No one knew anything about him, except that he was fabulously rich, and had descended upon London some ten years previously from Paris, or Berlin, or Vienna—and had immediately become a power in the city, and within a year or so had grown to be omnipotent in certain circles.

He had a wonderfully appointed house in Park Lane, one of those smaller ones just at the turnout of Grosvenor Street, and there he entertained in a reserved fashion.

It had been remarked by one or two people who had time to think—a rare case in these days—that he had never made a disadvantageous friend, from his very first arrival. If he had to use undesirable for business purposes, he used them only for that, in a crisp, hard way, and never went to their houses. Every acquaintance even was selected with care for a definite end. One of his favorite phrases was that "It was only the fool who coins for himself limitations."

At this time, as he sat smoking a fine cigar in his library, which looked out on the park, he was perhaps eighty years old or thereabouts, and but for his eyes, wise as serpent's, he might have been ten years younger.

Opposite to him, facing the light, a young man lounged in a great leather chair. The visitor in Francis Markrute's library nearly always faced the light, while he himself had his back to it.

There was no doubt about this visitor's nation! He was flamboyantly English. If you had wished to send a prize specimen of the race to a World's Fair, you could not have selected anything finer. He was perhaps more Norman than Saxon, for his hair was dark, though his eyes were blue, and the marks of breeding in the creature showed as plainly as in a Derby winner.

Francis Markrute always smoked his cigars to the end if he were at leisure, and the weed happened to be a good one, but Lord Tancred (Frisfram Lorrimer Guiscard, 24th Baron Tancred, of Wrayth in the County of Suffolk) flung his into the grate after a few whiffs, and he laughed with a slightly whimsical bitterness as he went on with the conversation.

"Yes, Francis, my friend, the game here is played out. I am thirty and there is nothing interesting left for me to do but emigrate to Canada for a while at least, and take up a ranch."

"Wrayth mortgaged heavily, I suppose?" asked Mr. Markrute, quietly.

"Pretty well; and the Northern property, too. When my mother's jointure is paid, there is not a great deal left this year, it seems. I don't mind much. I had had a pretty fair time, before these beastly Radicals made things so difficult."

The financier nodded and the young man went on: "My forbears got rid of what they could; there was not a great deal of ready money to come into, and one had to live."

Francis Markrute smiled, and he thoughtfully.

"Naturally," he said at last: "only the question is how long—I prefer to exchange if you settle its duration—it is the drudgery and trusting to chance, and a gradual sinking, which seems to me a poor game. Did you ever read de Musset's 'Role'?"

"The fellow who had arrived at his last night, and to whom, the little girl was so kind? Yes. Well?"

"You reminded me of Jacques Role—that is all."

"Oh, come, it is not as bad as that!" Lord Tancred exclaimed, and he laughed. "I can collect a few thousands still, even here, and I can go to Canada. I believe there is any quantity of money to be made there, with a little capital, and it is a nice, open-air life. I just looked in this afternoon, on my way back from Scotland, that if you I should be going out to prospect about the end of November, and could not join you for the pleasant on the 20th, as you were good enough to ask me to do."

The financier half-closed his eyes. When he did this, there was always something of importance working in his brain.

"You have not any glaring vices, Tancred," he said. "You are no gambler, either on the turf or at cards. You are not over-addicted to expensive ladies. You are cultivated—for a sportsman—and you have made one or two decent speeches in the House of Lords. You are, in fact, rather a fine specimen of your class. It seems a pity you should have to shut down and go to the Colonies."

"Oh, I don't know! And I have not altogether got to shut down," the young man said, "only the show is growing rather rotten over here. We have let the rabble, the most unfit and ignorant, have the casting vote, and the machine now will crush any man. I have kept out of politics as much as I can, and I am glad of it."

Francis Markrute got up and lowered the blind a few inches. A miserable September sun was trying to shine into the room. If Lord Tancred had not been so preoccupied with his own thoughts, he would have remarked this restlessness on the part of his host. He was no fool. But his mind was far away. It almost startled him when the cold, deliberate voice continued:

"I have a proposition to make to you—should you care to accept it. I have a niece, a widow. She is rather an attractive lady. If you will marry her, I will pay off all your mortgages, and settle on her quite a princely dower."

"Good Lord!" said Lord Tancred.

The financier reddened a little about the temples, and his eyes for an instant gave forth a flash of steel. There had been an infinite variety of meanings hidden in the exclamation, but he demanded suavely:

"What point of the question causes you to exclaim 'Good Lord'?"

The sang-froid of Lord Tancred never deserted him. "The whole thing," he said,—"to marry at all to begin with,—and to marry an unknown woman, to have one's debts paid for the rest—it is a tall order."

"A most common occurrence. Think of the number of your peers who have gone to America for their wives, for no other reason."

"And think of the rotters they are, most of them!—and think of the children they leave. I mayn't be much catch financially, but I have one of the oldest names and titles in England—and up to now we have not had any cads or cowards in the family. By Jove! Francis, what are you driving at? Come and sit, man. I am not starving, and can work if it should ever come to that."

Mr. Markrute smoothed his hair. He was a peculiarly still person generally.

"Yes, it was a blunder, I admit it, to put it this way. So I will be frank with you. My niece is also, my friend, as old as yours. My niece is and I have left in the world. I would like to see her married to an Englishman—I would like to see her married to you of all Englishmen—because I like you, and you have qualities about you which count in life. Oh, I believe me," and he raised a protesting finger to call an interruption—"I have studied you, these years, there is nothing you can say for yourself, or your affairs, that I do not know."

Lord Tancred laughed.

"My dear old boy," he said, "we have been friends for a long time, and now we are coming to home truths, I must say I like your direct, cold-blooded point of view on every subject. I like your knowledge of wines and cigars and pictures, and you are a most entertaining companion. But for my soul, I would not like to have you married, much as she took after you!"

"You think she would be cold-blooded, too?" "Undoubtedly; but it is all perfectly proper. I don't believe you mean a word you are saying. It is some kind of a joke."

Have you ever known me to make a mistake, Tancred?" Mr. Markrute asked, calmly.

"No, I haven't, and that is the odd part of it. What the devil do you mean, really, Francis?"

"I mean what I say. I will pay every debt you have, and give you a charming wife with a fortune."

Lord Tancred got up and walked about the room. He was a perfectly natural creature, stolid, and calm as those of his race; disciplined and deliberate in moments of danger or difficulty, he yet never lived under self-conscious control, as the financier did; he was rather moved now and so he walked about. He was with a friend, and it was not the moment to have to bother over disguising his feelings.

"Oh, it is nonsense, Francis. I could not do it. I have knocked about the world as you know, and since you are aware of everything about me, you say, you have probably heard some of my likings, and dislikings. I never go after a woman unless she attracts me, and I would never marry one of them unless I were madly in love with her, whether she had money or no, though I believe I would hate a wife with money in any case. She'd be saying like the American lady of poor Darrowood: 'It's my motor and you can't have it to-day.'"

"You would marry a woman, then, if you were in love?" Francis Markrute asked, "in spite of every thing?"

"Probably. But I have never been really in love. Have you?" It is all story-book stuff, that almighty passion, I expect. They none of them matter very much after a while, do they, old boy?"

"I have understood it is possible for a woman to matter," the financier said, and he drew in his lips.

"Well, up to us, I don't think," Lord Tancred answered.

live, since my sister is dead—he is not worth powder and shot."

The Countess Shulski gave the faintest shiver of her shoulders, while her eyes grew blacker with resentment—she did not speak. Francis Markrute stood by the mantelpiece and lit a cigar before he continued; he knew he must choose his words, as he was dealing with no helpless thing.

"You are twenty-three years old, Zara, and you were married at sixteen," he said at last. "And up to thirteen, at least, I know you were very highly educated; you understand something of life, I expect."

"Life!" she said. "Now there was a concentrated essence of bitterness in her voice. "Mon dieu! Life and men!"

"Yes, you probably think you know men," she lifted her upper lip a little, and showed her even teeth. It was like an animal snarling.

"I know that they are either selfish weaklings, or craft, hateful brutes like Ladislau—or clever, successful manipulators like you, my Uncle—that is enough! Something we women must be always sacrificed to!"

"Well, you don't know Englishmen!" "Yes, I remember my father very well. Cold and hard to my darling," and here her voice trembled a little. "He only thought of himself, and to rush to England for sport, and leave her alone for months and months. Selfish and vile all of them."

"In spite of that I have found you an English husband, whom you will be good enough to take, Madam," Francis Markrute announced authoritatively.

She gave a little laugh—if anything so mirthless could be called a laugh.

"You have no power over me. I shall do no such thing."

"I think you will," the financier said, with quiet assurance. "I know you. There are terms of course."

She glanced at him sharply—the expression in those somber eyes was often alert like a wild animal's about to be attacked, only she had trained herself generally to keep the lids lowered.

"What are the terms?" she said. And as she spoke, Francis Markrute thought of the black panther in the Zoo, whom he was to-morrow going to watch on Sunday mornings. She reminded him so of the beast at the moment.

He had been constrained up to this, but now the question being one of business, all his natural ease of manner returned, and he sat down opposite her and blew rings of smoke from his cigar.

"The terms are, that the boy Mikko shall be provided for for life. He shall be a very decent people, and have his talent properly cultivated."

He stopped abruptly and remained silent.

Countess Shulski clasped her hands convulsively in her lap, and with all the pride and control of her voice, there was a note of anguish too, which would have touched any heart but one so firmly guarded as Francis Markrute's.

"Oh, oh!" she said—so low he could only just hear her. "I have paid the price of my body and soul once for them. It is too much to ask it a second time."

"That is as you please," said the financier.

He seldom made a mistake in his methods with people. He left nothing to chance. He led up the conversation to the right point, used his bomb, and then showed absolute indifference. To display interest in a move, when one was really interested, was always a point to the adversary. But he maintained, could be simulated when necessary, but must never be shown when real. So he left his niece in silence, while she pondered over his bargain, knowing full well what would be the result. She got up from her chair and leaned upon the back of it, her face looked white as death in the dying after-glow of light.

"Can you tell me what my life was like with Ladislau?" he asked. "A plaything for his brutal pleasures to begin with—a decoy duck to trap the other man. I found afterward, tortured and insulted from morning to night. I hated him always, but he seemed so kind, benevolent—kind to my darling, whom you were leaving to die."

Here Francis Markrute winced, and a look of pain came into his hard face, which he hid behind in protest, and then dropped it. He had never been on.

"And she was beginning to love him, and we were so poor, so I married him."

Then she swept toward the door. "I am press air, the rather shabby dark dress making a swirl behind her, and when she got there, she the world—himself. He knew they could both be used to the greatest advantage and pleasure by a man who apprehended things.

Then he turned to the Moniteur, which was on a low stand near by, and he read again a paragraph which had pleased him at breakfast.

"The Duke of Glastonbury and Lady Ethelrida Montfichet entertained at dinner last night a small party at Glastonbury House, among the guests being"—and here he skipped some high-sounding titles, and let his eyes feast upon his own name—"Mr.

Francis Markrute."

Then he smiled and gazed into the fire, and no one would have recognized him by the eyes as he said sorry.

"Ethelrida."

Chapter III

When the Countess Shulski contentedly nestled beside the fire, his eyes were looking into the park, where the deer and turned and spoke again, with her hand on the bronze tracings of the ingreplate, making unconsciously a highly dramatic picture—a sudden last ray of the sinking sun shot out and struck the glory of her hair, turning it to flame above her brow.

"I tell you it is too much," she said, with almost a sob in her voice. "I will not do it!" And then she went out and closed the door.

Francis Markrute left alone, leaning back in his chair, and puffed his cigar calmly while he mused.

What strange things were women! Any man could manage them if he reckoned only with their temper outbursts when dealing with them, and paid no attention to their actual words. Francis Markrute was a philosopher. A number of the shelves of his library were filled with works on the subject of philosophy, and a well-thumbed volume of the fragments of Epicurus lay on a table by his side. He picked it up now and read: "He who wastes his youth on high feeling on which no woman forgets that he is like a man who wastes out his overcoat in the summer."

He had not wasted his youth either on wine or women—only he had studied both, and their effects upon the thing which until yesterday had interested him most in thick veil. She had a good deal to say to herself, minutes after she left the library. The sun had just set, and the damp air was cold, with the pretty set of roses in the garden, and the fragrance of the leaves and flowers, and the fragrance of the flowers. Zara Shulski did not know of the time when she had slipped into the room, and the time when she had nearly to the Academy. The time when she had been for the first time in the room, and the time when she had been for the first time in the room, and the time when she had been for the first time in the room.

Perhaps they would have a good time. But she thought of the time when she had been for the first time in the room, and the time when she had been for the first time in the room, and the time when she had been for the first time in the room.

FICKLE FREDDY'S LOVES

By Carolyn Wells

His First Love—Bess. Who Plays Like a Boy

THE nicest girl in all this town,
Er anywurs I guess,
Is 'Lizabeth McCullom Brown,
Folks call her "Tomboy Bess."

YOU otter see her throw a stone,
Or hit a good swif' ball!
Th'uther girls jes' haf to own
That Bessie beats them all!

YOU see she has us fellers' ways,
And that's w'y we enjoy
Playin' wiv Bess, becus she plays
Ezzackly like a boy.

SAY, I don't have a bit o' use
Fer any girl w'ats bound
To fluster like a silly goose
When boys come traipsin' round.

WHO fusses 'bout her ribbon bows,
And wrinkullin' her dress;
W'y Bess jes' loves to tear her clo'es!
An' that's why I love Bess.

YOU otter see her climb a tree!
She scoots up like a cat!
She gets herself some scratched, but, Gee!
Bessie don't think 'bout that.

W'Y even when she's going some place,
All togged out like a toff,
Jes' say, "I'll stump yer fer a race,"
And Bess 'll start right off!

I SWING on her gate ev'ry day,
Becus I love her so;
'N I jes' grin w'en fellers say,
"Hi! Tomboy Bess's beau!"

The Match-Makers

A NOVELLETTE
By F Harris Deans

WHEN her feet reached the door, Mrs. Veralour sat staring thoughtfully into the fire.

"It does seem such a pity," she murmured, "that a couple so exactly suited to each other shouldn't be encouraged."

I gave a non-committal grunt, and lit a cigarette.

"Don't you think so?" she persisted, raising her eyes to mine.

"If'n," I said, feeling an answer was more or less imperative. Mrs. Veralour gave an exasperated sigh.

"Oh, you've no sympathy for anybody," she declared tartly, "since your own engagement."

"I received no encouragement," I pointed out, "at least Elizabeth swears I didn't."

"Is Elizabeth coming this afternoon?"

"What an unnecessary question."

"Because you are here? You're the most conceited man I know."

"No, because you're here. You're the least conceited woman I know."

Mrs. Veralour gave a vexed, yet subtly pleased smile.

"For goodness sake do be sensible," she urged. "A poor old widow woman!"

I smiled. A smile is the jewel of conversation. It means just whatever it is taken to mean.

Elizabeth selected this opportune moment to put in an appearance. Opportune, because even the most intentional smile must eventually fade into speech.

"We were just talking," I began, "about

"About Gladys and Jack Henderson," Mrs. Veralour interrupted me. "As if I had intended saying anything else."

"What have they been doing? Have you drunk all the tea, Dick? Has he, Mrs. Veralour?"

"They haven't been doing anything; that's the trouble. Shall I ring for a larger cup, Mrs. Veralour? She'll empty one of these before you know where you are."

"I won't; don't be so rude. One lump please, Mrs. Veralour. Thanks, Dick. Well, what about Gladys?"

"Well it's this way," I commenced.

Betty gave me a martyred look.

"Do be quiet for a moment. May he smoke?"

"I have been smoking," I remarked. "As a matter of fact I only threw my cigarette away because Mrs. Veralour thought I looked too contented."

"I didn't say anything of the sort, I'd abeth," cried Mrs. Veralour, indignantly.

"I didn't say you did," I retorted. "I said, you thought. You don't listen."

"Oh be quiet. Go on Mrs. Veralour."

Mrs. Veralour put down her tea cup.

"I was telling Dick," she explained, "about Gladys and Jack Henderson."

"Why, aren't they engaged yet?" said Elizabeth.

"No. That's what I'm coming to. They're such a suitable couple; don't you think we ought to lend them a helping hand?"

"If'n," I said, doubtfully; "what particular sort of helping hand?"

"Throw them together?" suggested Elizabeth, brightly.

"No. As a matter of fact they're never apart. That's where it's so awkward. You see they monopolize each other so much, that they—they—"

"Do," I said, helpfully.

"Yes, that's just it, they do. They're so open about it that other people fight shy of them. It's not giving either of them a chance."

"Hey!" I cried, surprised. "Why I should have thought—"

"No you wouldn't," said Mrs. Veralour, unkindly, "not if you stopped to think. It's an unfair handicap to put up a 'Trespassers will be Prosecuted' notice before you are actually engaged. I don't see the element of uncertainty about you, at least the other up to the mark."

"You suggest, Mrs. Veralour," I said, appalled, "that the noblest of all emotions is nothing but a dog in the manger sort of selfishness?"

"Yes," said Mrs. Veralour, solemnly; "as if you didn't know! Besides it's not just a brother and sisterly, when there's a third person. You must have a spice of jealousy, too, with you, Elizabeth."

"Oh, yes," said Elizabeth, though she couldn't possibly know anything about it.

"You know people never know how much they want each other until somebody else comes along, wanting."

"You may be right," I admitted, "but what can we do?"

"Well," Mrs. Veralour hesitated and appeared somewhat embarrassed. Suddenly she shrugged her shoulders with an air of resolution. "You're both engaged," she asserted, defiantly. "So, so."

"I don't know what she means," I said, gazing help-

"Aren't you going to do it up again then, Mr. Blake?"

lessly at Elizabeth; "do you, Betty?"

Elizabeth shook her head perplexedly.

"I mean, couldn't we—well, encourage them?"

"Now that's an idea that does you credit," I exclaimed, admiringly.

"Don't be sarcastic. You know what I mean, don't you, Elizabeth?"

"I don't know that I do, quite," murmured Elizabeth, wrinkling her forehead.

"Why," cried Mrs. Veralour, impatiently, "don't you see—?" She whispered the rest of the sentence in Elizabeth's ear.

"Oh!" cried Elizabeth, half in alarm. Unexpectedly she gurgled delightedly.

"That'd act Mrs. Veralour, wouldn't it," she cried, dimpling. She glanced at me from the corner of her eye. "Shall we tell him?"

"Do you think you ought," I hinted, hastily.

"Well he'll have to be told," said Mrs. Veralour, regarding me doubtfully.

Elizabeth leaned backward over the arm of her chair, while I inclined my head respectfully.

When I learned the details of the scheme I threw myself back in my chair and regarded my hostess in absolute horror.

"Don't let him look at me like that, Elizabeth," she cried acutely.

"Don't be so silly, Dick," said Elizabeth, reprovingly; "it'll be awful fun."

"You—you—" I cried, groping for a suitable word.

"We're not," cried Elizabeth, "and you're not to say it, Dick."

Presently a thought came to me, and I gave a relieved smile.

"Anyhow," I said, "I don't believe Betty can."

"Can what?" demanded Mrs. Veralour.

"Why, flirt," I explained.

Mrs. Veralour cast an inquiring glance toward Elizabeth.

Elizabeth gave me a derisive smile.

"You know better than that," she said. "Doesn't he, Mrs. Veralour?"

"Well, I must admit, I think he does," she assented.

"Bravo, Mrs. Veralour. That's a nasty one for you, Elizabeth."

There was a moment's silence, while Elizabeth grappled with Mrs. Veralour's remark.

"But look here, Mrs. Veralour," I began, "it's all very well for Elizabeth to flirt with Henderson."

"I shan't flirt with him," she reassured me, "only pretend to find him interesting, you know."

"Well we won't haggle over a name," I said. "What I'm after is, oughtn't somebody to do the same with Gladys?"

Elizabeth turned a scornful eye upon me.

"You mean you want to flirt with her," she suggested, coldly.

"Well, we weren't going to flirt if we were," I demurred. "You see it's not enough only to bring her up to the accepting point, I'm making her jealous; because, hang it all, it's the chap who proposes. At least, isn't it?"

"And you really think he'll be jealous of you?" asked Elizabeth, in a tone of incredulous curiosity.

"Here I say!" I protested. "Dash it, there's no need to have a slanging match is there, Mrs. Veralour?"

"I wasn't slanging you," said Elizabeth. "Do you call that slanging Mrs. Veralour?"

"My dears," said Mrs. Veralour, looking somewhat worried. "I wish you both wouldn't always appeal to me."

"Well, anyhow, look here," I cried. "I'll bet you—"

"A bracelet," I interjected.

"A box of chocolates," said I.

"Chocolates!" she cried, scornfully.

"If you had any real delicacy of feeling," I mentioned, "chocolates would appeal to you as a more than usually appropriate bet."

"But they're so cheap," she grumbled.

"I seek congruity in a needless expense," I remarked.

"Regardless!" she cried. "Regardless' is very good, isn't it, Mrs. Veralour?"

"A box of chocolates," I went on, unperturbed. "That I make Henderson more jealous of me, than Gladys is of you."

"Done," cried Elizabeth, excitedly. "Or what's more, I'll bet you a thousand pounds—"

"That's right," I said, approvingly. "Keep well within your allowance."

"That he doesn't get jealous of you at all. There! She paused and looked at me, breathless and defiant. I stared at her in some embarrassment.

"What's that mean, Mrs. Veralour?" I appealed. Mrs. Veralour was looking somewhat shocked.

"Oh, but Elizabeth, you mustn't. You really mustn't. It means," she turned to me, "that if Elizabeth—well—is very close to him he'll lose all interest in Gladys."

"I say!" I gasped, with a horrified glance at Elizabeth.

She looked at me rebelliously.

"Well you shouldn't dare me then?"

"She doesn't mean it really," Mrs. Veralour comforted me. "Do you, Elizabeth?"

"I suppose I don't," she admitted, reluctantly.

There was a slight pause.

"But the idea," she asked Mrs. Veralour; "what do you think of my idea?"

"Well it seems all creditable enough," I admitted.

"What a thing to say!"

"I like success," I finished, consolingly.

"It's sacred then," said Elizabeth, as she rose to her feet. "Are you coming with me, Dick? You

The Great American Case of "HUSBAND VS. WIFE"

By Virginia Terhune Van de Water

N married life one may be moral, yet selfish; conscientious along strictly correct lines, yet over-critical. One may be guided entirely by the law, yet neglect the impulses of the heart; one may observe the letter of the law, and yet on it be miserably un-matrimonial.

There is a big difference among which are mercy and faith. I lived my own married life I had thought of a woman were moral and steadfast, a man capable and faithful, then I must be a widow.

I had just been graduated from College when I married. I was ten years her senior and was not a big man, having gone right from Preparatory School to the Law School, through which I paid my way by working during vacations. That I did not attend the University courses of my last year I was ready for college and then, then, then.

My mother, and I felt that my widowed mother needed all of the money our parents had left. I did not appreciate the sacrifice I had made until I met my wife.

I was to marry. We became engaged immediately, but to this day I remember the shudder the peculiar feeling of uncertainty I had when she asked me,—"What year College?" and I had to confess that I had none except the first year.

As time had permitted I had read and studied and had striven to keep pace with my more fortunate friends. But as the intellectual girl.

But as the intellectual girl I suspected that I felt the loss of the classical education for which I had worked, for she said, quickly.

After all, a university course can but give the best of what is in it, and I had to go that for himself.

Her tact, her insight, too, I found it easy to explain to her my own frustrated hopes, and my attention was flattered.

But I fell in love with her, and I was certain it is that, when I married her three months later, I had found my happiness for life so far as I was concerned.

Upon her answer, I was so sure that when she accepted I had found the woman I had known that she had been a mental picture of my ideal.

I had so know that she had been a mental picture of my ideal. I had so know that she had been a mental picture of my ideal.

I had so know that she had been a mental picture of my ideal. I had so know that she had been a mental picture of my ideal.

I had so know that she had been a mental picture of my ideal. I had so know that she had been a mental picture of my ideal.

I had so know that she had been a mental picture of my ideal. I had so know that she had been a mental picture of my ideal.

I had so know that she had been a mental picture of my ideal. I had so know that she had been a mental picture of my ideal.

I had so know that she had been a mental picture of my ideal. I had so know that she had been a mental picture of my ideal.

I had so know that she had been a mental picture of my ideal. I had so know that she had been a mental picture of my ideal.

I had so know that she had been a mental picture of my ideal. I had so know that she had been a mental picture of my ideal.

I had so know that she had been a mental picture of my ideal. I had so know that she had been a mental picture of my ideal.

I had so know that she had been a mental picture of my ideal. I had so know that she had been a mental picture of my ideal.

I had so know that she had been a mental picture of my ideal. I had so know that she had been a mental picture of my ideal.

I had so know that she had been a mental picture of my ideal. I had so know that she had been a mental picture of my ideal.

She flushed, and protested vehemently:

"Please, Will, never say a thing like that about yourself again! I may be clever, I may be I am, but so are you. And," dropping her eyes moodily, there is really no need of your telling people that you have not had a classical education, unless they ask you if you have. Promise me not to volunteer the information, won't you, dear?—for education seems to me such an important thing, you know."

I felt vaguely uncomfortable, but of course I promised.

When we were furnishing our apartment for our marriage I suggested that we have a bed on the couch-bed in a small room which we called "the den," so in case a friend should come to see us we might ask him or her to remain overnight. But Ellen thought otherwise.

"I think," she said, "that it is a mistake to have any kind of a spare room, for it costs people to widow-sister which Ellen was willing to adopt with regard to her widower-father. Therefore I held my peace.

I knew that Ellen tried to do what she felt to be right in all matters. I almost envied her her certainty of the wisdom of any decision she made. When she had settled a matter in her own mind, it was settled once for all. There was no haunting arrière pensée, no wondering as to whether she was right or not. So when she made a rule that the first Sunday of each month was the day on which my sister was to dine with us, and that her father was to come on the same day, I agreed, knowing that the rule was made and would not be changed. Still I did venture to suggest to Ellen that it might be a pleasant thing for Alice, my sister, to be invited occasionally to "spend the day," in the good, old-fashioned way. A shadow of annoyance crossed my sister's face.

Will, I think you forget how busy I am and that my time is not as free as is that of some women," she protested. "There is the Browning Club, you know, which meets once a week; there is the Women's Civic Reform Club each Thursday, and the French Conversation Class one night a week; I try to take in some good music every few days; the Fortnightly Club has made me Secretary, and the Church Guild has just elected me President. Added to all that I am taking a regular course of serious reading this Winter."

"Yes," I remarked dryly, "you are a very busy woman."

"And I intend to keep busy and to make the best of myself," she declared, almost defiantly. "I wish I could believe that you mean to do the same."

"Don't you believe it?" I asked.

"Not if I am to judge by your recent actions, my dear. I have watched you all this week. This is Wednesday night. Or Monday morning you sat in the library for a half-hour after breakfast before you thought of starting for your office, smoking and reading the paper, until the room was full of tobacco smoke, which, I may remark in passing, you know I dislike."

"You asked me not to smoke in any other room," I reminded her.

"I certainly did, and I still ask it. The tobacco habit is, at best, a dirty one, and I do not care to have my friends find my house smelling of the nauseous fumes. But let that pass, as it is beside the point. You came home to luncheon that same day and read for a while again. After you had gone back to the office I looked at the book you had been perusing and found it was a mere novel. I had hoped that it was something really worth while. That night you had letters to write, not even making time for a chat with me. Yesterday it was the same way,—except that you made a dinner-call with me last night. To-day has been a repetition of yesterday. Dear,"—more gently,—"you know I only tell you of these things because I am so anxious to have you make the best of what is in you. And I hate to see you throwing your time away."

I waited a minute to collect my thoughts before answering. Then, in spite of a feeling of irritation, I spoke smilingly:

"Now that you have had your little say, let me have mine, Nell, dear. The novel you spoke of is one that deals with a knotty legal problem, and is a book which lawyers are talking about, and which Judge Andrews advised me recently to read carefully. That explains my seeming frivolity with regard to a 'mere novel.' The night on which you say I was 'writing letters,' I was really making out bills. The next day I read that same 'mere make a convenience of our home. And if we say that we have no spare chamber our friends will not expect to pay a night's rent."

"But," I asked, "about my sister? It might be a pleasant thing for her to run in once in a while and spend the night?"

My wife was positive.

"I hardly think," she affirmed, "that your sister would care to spend the night here when her own home is so near. As for my father, as he has a home of his own here in the city I think it would be very ridiculous for him to think of coming to make us a regular visit."

There was no valid reason why I should not agree to an arrangement with regard to my

THE ADVENTURE
OF

TRES OF CUPID

No. 1. It's just steps from the heart of the man to the heart of the woman.

WINKLEY

NEW YORK awoke on Saturday morning to find staring in its face the most astonishing announcement it had ever seen. On foot-lots and building fronts and on street cars and show windows, wherever one looked one saw emblazoned in letters large and brilliant this strange command:

"Read it, then eat it—Tomorrow's Sunday Star."

That was all. People searched in vain for some explanation, but not one of the hundreds of posters and placards which flaunted their colors on every block bore anything more than those eight words.

The city's curiosity was aroused as never before by this extraordinary advertisement, so persistently repeated that it seemed as if the very walls and pavements were shouting it. Everybody was talking about it and asking everybody else what it meant. Whoever heard of eating a Sunday newspaper? Of course nobody had, and the more people argued, the more perplexing the riddle grew.

Not until noon did anything occur to clear up the mystery, and what happened then merely whetted the public's curiosity. At that hour an army of boys invaded the streets with a very special, very extra edition of the Pleading Star containing a huge double-page advertisement boldly headed: "Everybody in Greater New York Can Read AND EAT Tomorrow's Sunday Star."

"The advertisements you see on every hand" read those who were lucky enough to get a paper before the edition was exhausted, "mean exactly what I say. The Comic Supplement of to-morrow's Sunday Star will be not only edifying, but edible. By a miracle of modern science it will be printed on a paper that you can eat. You'll get in it both fun and good—as a pre-meal treat with your Sunday paper."

"When you've laughed your fill at the screamingly funny pictures, tear the supplement into pieces and eat it just as you would bread or cake. You'll find it as delicious as ice cream, as nourishing as roast beef and as easy to digest as chicken broth. We say again: 'Read it, then eat it'—there's health and the greatest enjoyment in doing both."

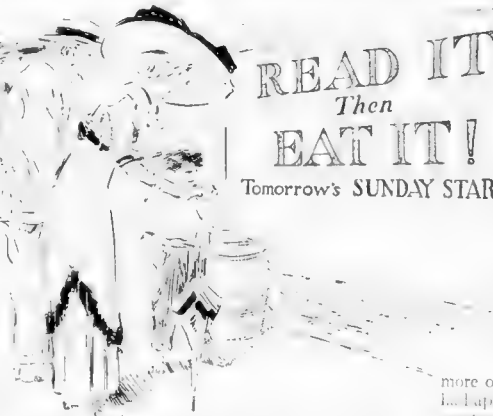

Particular emphasis was laid upon the perfectly harmless nature of the wonderful edible supplement. Its delectable and nourishing qualities were indorsed by a volume of signed statements from the most eminent scientists. "With every copy," ran the scientists' comment, "goes our positive guarantee that, no matter how large the quantity eaten, it cannot injure the most delicate stomach."

While the news that the Star's comic supplement could really be eaten was spreading like wildfire and throwing the whole city into a fever of eager anticipation, the happiest man in the world was, by all accounts, John Frisbie, the Sunday Star's youthful circulation manager. The success of the comic supplement not only assured his high-salaried position with the Star for a long time to come, but also brought him a cash bonus of $10,000.

From the day Frisbie had taken charge of the Star, two years before, its circulation had begun to grow by leaps and bounds under the stimulus of a series of brilliant schemes which drove rival newspapers to desperation and occasionally to bankruptcy. There came a time, however, when the Star stood still or showed only slight gains for weeks in succession. Through many sleepless nights and nerve-racking days Frisbie cudgeled his brain for a plan which would send the figures soaring again. But everything that suggested itself proved of no avail.

"I don't know what the trouble is," he had told the Star's Business Manager in despair. "Either I'm running dry of ideas or the public is getting tired of the bait it used to jump for so eagerly. Well, it's up to you to do something in a hurry," roared the Business Manager, who never had any ideas of his own,

How John Frisbie Became the Greatest Circulation Manager on Earth—Almost but always claimed the credit of all suggestions made by his subordinates. "Push up our circulation over the next four weeks within four weeks and I'll give you a check for $10,000. If you can't, get out and I'll give somebody else a chance."

The four weeks would be up to-morrow, and on that day the net circulation of the Sunday Star would reach the tremendous total of six hundred copies. And there was no doubt that fully a half million more papers could be sold if the presses could print them. New York was indeed hungry for the edible supplement, and over the telephone came continual calls from news-dealers who wanted to double and even triple their original orders.

What pleased Frisbie most of all was that this hunger would not be satisfied in a single Sunday. To-morrow's supplement would be flavored with vanilla, the following Sunday's would be flavored with chocolate, and so on through orange, lemon, almond and the whole list of flavors—a new one every Sunday. It was a circulation-building scheme which the public would hardly tire of for at least a year.

Frisbie awoke early the next morning, for he had planned to spend the day in completing his advertising plans for the coming week. Almost the first sound to reach his ears was the loud howl of a child in the flat next door, teasing its mother for "just one more supplement." Frisbie chuckled to think that scenes like that were doubtless being enacted in a million homes.

It was a hot summer day—the kind of day which would ordinarily mean a heavy drop in the Star's circulation. Yet, although so hot and so early, Frisbie saw with satisfaction on the news-stand just across the street a sign reading: "Sunday Stars All Sold Out. Leave Your Orders Now for Next Sunday."

Farther down the street he could see from his window an immense crowd storming the doors of a store where evidently a few copies still remained unsold.

As he hurriedly dressed he munched, in lieu of his usual breakfast, one of the supplements which he had brought home the night before. It was, as it had been represented to be—delicious, appetizing, far more satisfying than his customary chops and eggs.

His trip to the office that morning was one long, enthusiastic testimonial to the success of his own circulation scheme. The edible supplement was in everybody's mouth. People on their way to church or the beaches stuffed their cheeks with it, and school boys, young or old, was too dignified to enjoy nibbling at the dainty morsels. Everybody was happy except the news-boys who had been unable to get copies of the Star.

So overwhelming was the evidence of his triumph that Frisbie was ill prepared for the sight of a mob of boys when he stepped out of his doorway at Brooklyn Bridge. For a mass of two blocks around the Star building surged an angry, excited mob, all cursing, wailing and shouting, all shaking their fists in the air and in the direction of the Star's offices.

Frisbie did not seem to be to his horror that every boy in the mob was packed mob-hore with a copy of the edible supplement's pages and that the mob with apparent indifference on the faces of the foreheads and the noses of the boys.

It was a sight that struck to the very soul of Frisbie. Was this the horrible effect of the edible supplement? Suppose it were poisonous. If it had killed 100,000 readers only to become the property of the mob, the possibility of whom he had never before the complexions of half New York might never be ruined. These problems troubled Frisbie. Nervous himself to find that at whatever cost, he forced his way through the crowd to the entrance of the Star building. The terror in the elevator revealed the fact that he had not escaped the weird effects of the edible supplement. The cold beads of perspiration on his forehead made a pitifully moist setting for the gleam which appeared there—the famous Katzenbach and the old Captain taking a dip in the surf. On his cheeks he beheld a rash of nonpareil type.

In his office Frisbie found the Business Manager literally speechless with contempt and anger. There were also numerous chemists and physicians, summoned to find, if possible, an antidote for the edible supplement; and a host of lawyers, already preparing their defense for the damage suits that were bound to follow. Outside, two or three salesmen for stomach pumps waited eagerly, in the hope of landing big orders.

The Business Manager's countenance spoke the volumes which his tongue could not. His face, always florid, had turned an apoplectic red. This furnished the most striking background imaginable for Happy Hooligan, in gaudy blue and yellow, who danced a jig on the Big Chief's left cheek; and for Maud, the mule, who was kicking Gloomy Gus over the edge of his double chin.

While the Business Manager of the Star was vainly struggling for words, a messenger entered with a telegram for Frisbie. It was from Hans Phlegel, the brilliant but erratic inventor of the edible supplement, who had sold Frisbie the idea, and who had been in charge of the manufacture of the last issue.

"John Frisbie, etc.:

The whole trouble lies in the fact that my original formula was prepared in winter and I forgot to make allowance for the heat of a day like this. The links are very powerful and under the influence of the sun's rays, reflected and break out in a tidal form on the people's faces. Don't be alarmed—the pictures will all disappear in a day or so without the slightest injury to the skin.

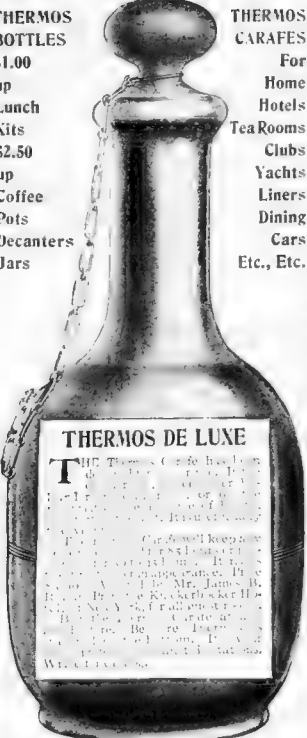

I am sorry I shall not be able to supply the Sunday Star with any more edible supplements because I have just closed a deal with the British Trade Society for exclusive rights to my invention. They are going to send out edible tracts with Bible verses to the natives of Africa and China. Hope to perfect chemical formulae so that Sunday morning tea and pictures will stay sharp and clear on the people's faces until the end of the week."

Case of Husband vs. Wife

...after as a weapon with which to strike her mother. And Ellen loved the child fondly. But her nature and mine were very different. Perhaps she was more sensitive to the child's needs.

"During these years my practice grew. By the time we had been married five or six years I found that Ellen felt a certain jealousy or resentment toward the poorer class of clients—those who did not add to my reputation, and certainly not to my income. She urged me to devote less time to my friends from whom I would not accept large fees, and to the very poor from whom I would accept none, and to devote more energy to things that were worth while. I want you to remember, Ellen, that I am not a selfish man. I am a man who is proud of the men who work for me. I am a man who is proud of the men who work for me. I am a man who is proud of the men who work for me."

"I am not a party lawyer," I said. "I am a man who is proud of the men who work for me. I am a man who is proud of the men who work for me. I am a man who is proud of the men who work for me."

"There is something about you," said Ellen, "that makes me feel that you are not a selfish man. I am a man who is proud of the men who work for me. I am a man who is proud of the men who work for me. I am a man who is proud of the men who work for me."

"Thus the pair, I am sure, would have been a very happy one. But the child, who was the center of their lives, was not so happy. She was a very sensitive child, and she was very fond of her mother. She was a very sensitive child, and she was very fond of her mother. She was a very sensitive child, and she was very fond of her mother."

"I was so sure," said Ellen, "that you were not a selfish man. I am a man who is proud of the men who work for me. I am a man who is proud of the men who work for me. I am a man who is proud of the men who work for me."

"I am not a party lawyer," I said. "I am a man who is proud of the men who work for me. I am a man who is proud of the men who work for me. I am a man who is proud of the men who work for me."

ing herself on the floor, burst into a torrent of sobs.

"I want Papa! I want Papa!" she cried. "As I bent to pick her up, my wife caught me by the arm and checked me."

"I am not a party lawyer," I said. "I am a man who is proud of the men who work for me. I am a man who is proud of the men who work for me. I am a man who is proud of the men who work for me."

"But, Ellen," I protested, "can't you see that she is not well? This is no time for discipline?"

"I shall not punish her now. You know that I am not in the habit of letting my children do as they please. I shall make a similar case of her. I shall make a similar case of her. I shall make a similar case of her."

"I am not a party lawyer," I said. "I am a man who is proud of the men who work for me. I am a man who is proud of the men who work for me. I am a man who is proud of the men who work for me."

Do you know how to smoke?

By John Tolliver, M. D.

DO you know how to smoke?

This is no idle question, nor is it asked of women and children, but of smokers, chiefly cigar and pipe users. The truth is that most such smokers don't know how to smoke. They not only do not understand how to prevent smoking from being obnoxious to others, but they themselves miss half the comfort of the "weed."

Cigars are, of course, the most expensive method of all and, strange to say, lovers of the rolled leaf are the worst violators of the simple rules of the nicotine cult. Watch one as he leans over the glass case of a cigar store. With thoughtful countenance and such skill, taste and information as he possesses, he selects the little domestic or imported bundle that is to please his palate and soothe his nerves. Ask him why and he'll tell you he chose this particular "perfecto" because of its "aroma" or "bouquet," its taste—the way the ash clings and a dozen other technical points, all good and sufficient reasons. Then he gnaws off the end with his teeth, saws it off with a pocket knife, stabs it with a little, patent, hollow stiletto or beheads it with the cigar-store guillotine.

Now if he is wise, and usually he is not, he slowly and gently blows through the cigar, driving out certain dust and debris which he with in its folds, especially if the purchase is an inexpensive one. This little precaution, for reasons not entirely understood, makes a vast difference in the flavor and the free burning of the cigar. The lighting, too, is important; the end should be ignited and no more. One puff at the match or gas-jet should be enough to light the edges of the tip. If one holds it longer to the flame the result is usually to make the tobacco burn faster on one side than the others and in so scorching the leaves that for the first ten minutes "Vuelta Abajo" tastes just like "Connecticut Cabbage." If it seems a little too damp some connoisseurs take the trouble to dry over the flame the first inch or more of their cigar.

Though he has failed in these things, his smoke is not yet ruined if he will only keep the cigar going and not carry it in his mouth between puffs. The fumes from the burning end of a cigar are acid and anything but pleasant, as anyone will find out if he holds it under the nostrils. Keep a cigar in your mouth and you get a large part of this pungent carbon-monoxide in your eyes and in the mucous membrane of your nose. When your eye or throat specialist makes you quit smoking some day, it will probably be not the fault of the "weed," but your fault, because you don't know how to smoke. Holding the cigar in the mouth causes the saliva to soak itself among the leaves and meet the approaching fire half way. The resulting battle of the elements, even in the best cigar in the world, emits a smell like a four-alarm fire in the woolen district.

Not only does the cigar so mis-smoked get the credit of being a "two-fer," but the careless performer at the wet and chewed end of it becomes criticized for his manners. He is sure to try to talk on the telephone and otherwise with thick and muffled utterance. Such human cigar-holders become entirely unconscious of its presence between their teeth, and I know even of a youth who proposed along a cigar. The girl's averted face and prompt "no" were "superinduced," as we doctors would say, by carbon monoxide. She said so afterward, and I heard her. Of course if mosquitoes are around it is different.

There is little advice to give the cigarette smoker. He has been told that his pet form of tobacco is the most dangerous, but he now knows better. Cigarette tobacco is the mildest and most harmless in the world. It is not half as strong as the pipe or cigar brands. The danger of the cigarette lies in its handiness. No trouble to take out one and light it, while you have a minute's wait. The cigar calls for time. The pipe demands time, opportunity to fill and considerable paraphernalia. The cigarette smoker doubts he ought not to inhale, but if he doesn't there is no pleasure in smoking the "weed" in that form.

The pipe is much simpler and easier to smoke in an orthodox way. If your mouth will stand the heat of their combustion, you will find more flavor and delight in the light, fast-burning aromatic mixtures. But if your tongue is easily "bitten" you will sooner or later fix your final choice on the cut, sliced, cubed, shredded and variously bedeviled forms of plug. Englishmen revel in mixtures which Americans would not smoke without a refrigerating attachment.

In filling a pipe the main thing is to make sure it is dry and clean. Press fluffy mixtures down hard for good results. With sliced plug you have a chance to use a little skill. Double the slice in the middle and roll it gently between your palms. Then take the bundle so formed and push it carefully into the bowl of your pipe, keeping the fibers of the tobacco running up and down, not horizontally. This gives an even continuity of the shreds along which the coal of fire will travel coolly and sweetly with a minimum tendency to go out.

If you are a pipe smoker and think you smoke too much, try using a clean, dry pipe each time and you will probably find it will help things more than cutting out half your smokes.

Don't have a "favorite" pipe. Have a dozen of them. Never smoke the same one twice in succession. When it comes to pipes, "My Lady Nicotine" loves a fickle lover.

The anti-tobacco league which raised a rather modest head this year, must not be laughed at by us who love tobacco, for once upon a time the prohibition movement was also young and feeble. The way to take the wind out of our enemy's sails is to stop the abuses of tobacco. Let us smoke with an eye to others. Watch where the smoke from your cigar is going. If it is traveling across the face of someone next to you hold it in the other hand. Don't cloud with smoke a room that contains women and children. Remember we don't smoke by divine right, but by sufferance, and if we are too obnoxious some day the non-smokers will turn and rend us.

Read how—but be sure you smoke

It's The Tobacco, Son— Not The Pipe

It's the old Squire that hands me this.

*Says he: "Son, I been fussin' with pipes a whole lot of years. Dallyin' with this an' tryin' that an' wonderin' why nonesuited quite perfect. Now I know.
I tries Prince Albert and right off it makes every pipe I have good as gold.
It's the tobacco—not the pipe."*

It's a poor pipe that won't taste right with Prince Albert tucked in the bowl. P. A. is the great pipe rejuvenator.

Take down 'most any old hod. Load 'er up with Prince Albert and she smokes sweet and clear. No sour heel, none of the old rankness, no tongue-bite.

It's the tobacco—not the pipe.

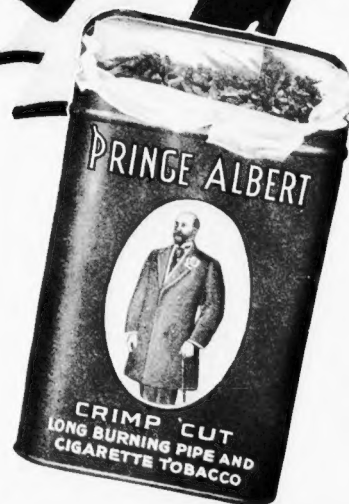

Prince Albert is made special for joyful pipe smoking. Made by a patented, exclusive process that takes out the old pipe drawbacks, takes out the bite and the rankness.

Now listen! These are facts. P. A. has worked a revolution in pipe smoking because it's different—a new deal—a real tobacco without a fault. No other tobacco can be like P. A., because of the patent process. Do you get that? Now try the others if you want to. Get the tobacco question settled.

But you're wise when the "justthesame" bunc is passed across.

All on-the-job dealers are ready to swap the joy smoke for U. S. coin. They know it's a steady-growing seller because it fills. Ten cent tins, 5c bag wrapped in weather-proof paper—awful handy when you want to roll up a cigarette—classy half-pound and pound humidors.
